

Lou Ronson:

Life experiences forge human rights champion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Lou Ronson, an elderly statesman of the community, has dedicated his life to human rights issues and fighting discrimination.

The seeds for his quest to eliminate prejudice and racism were sown when Ronson, 92, was a school-boy and he was himself the victim of anti-Semitism.

Ronson has served on numerous committees and organizations and was the driving force behind the creation of B'nai Brith Canada's Anti-Defamation

Celebrating those who make a difference First in an occasional series League, later the League for Human Rights.

The Toronto-born son of Russian Jewish immigrants, he was born Louis Rosenblatt in 1915. He served as a commissioner on the Ontario Human Rights Commission in 1985 and served as vice-chair until 1991. At that time, the commission was located on the exact site where his parents rented a flat when he was a child — on Simcoe Street, midway between Dundas and Queen streets.

When Ronson was 10, his family moved to Port Colborne, Ont., where he was enrolled in the local public school and where he encountered the anti-Semitism that played a major role in his lifelong determination to champion human rights.

"My first day at school, during recess, five kids came charging across the schoolyard, pointing to me and shouting, 'There's the new Jew.' And then I was attacked."

He was excluded from all social activities at the school, and he had only one friend, the only other Jewish boy at the school. This left an indelible mark on young Louis.

In 1927, the family moved back to Toronto. The 12-year-old entered Jarvis Collegiate, where he was once again shocked when all the Jewish students were in one class, known as "the Jewish class."

"Soon I was to learn that anti-Semitic taunts and jibes by students, and even some teachers, were not beyond the norm."

He adds that Jewish students maintained their self-esteem by achieving the highest class averages for each of their five years at the school and receiving a major number of scholarships.

When Ronson applied to chemical engineering at the University of Toronto in 1932 — a time when Jewish students were faced with strict quotas — he was one of six Jewish students accepted into the course from across the country.

After graduation, he was once again faced with blatant anti-Jewish rejection. After searching for a position in his field for a year, the university graduate accepted a menial job at a dry cleaning plant.

In 1943, he enlisted in the army, and when he filled out the required forms, the enrolling officer, who knew him in civilian life, suggested that he change his name from Louis Rosenblatt. He became Lou Ronson.

After the war, Ronson returned to the dry cleaning industry and rose to the position of president and chief executive officer of Sunshine Uniform Supply Co. Ltd. After Sunshine merged with 12 other companies, he assumed the presidency of Work Wear Corporation in 1975. From 1982 until his retirement in 1987, he served as chairman of the board.

Motivated by his early experiences, Ronson says he created the mandate for his life that "regardless of gender, creed, colour, ethnic origin, ancestry, disability or sexual orientation, everyone should be treated with total respect and freedom from discrimination."

Moroccan community marks 50 years in Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Moroccan Jews are celebrating 50 years since they began to settle in Toronto.

Some community leaders who have been here since the beginning are reflecting on how far they've come in such a short time.

Maurice Benzacar, who was one of the first Moroccans to make the move to Toronto reflected on how quickly the community flourished.

Benzacar came to Toronto from Casablanca in 1957, a year after Morocco, a country that had previously been under French rule, gained independence. He worked with the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services [JIAS] for more than 30 years as the director of settlement.

He said that while he helped many eastern European Jews settle in Toronto, he also volunteered to greet Moroccans at the airport and helped them find accommodation and work.

Although Benzacar and JIAS offered services and aid to help the new Canadians settle into a life in a foreign country, something was missing.

"When we first arrived here, we didn't have a place to pray... We have different minhag, we have different customs, we have different melodies, and it was impossible to blend [into the existing Ashkenazi congregations]... They are Jews like us, but we were different," he said.

"In those days, in 1957, we used to gather at the YMHA at Spadina and Bloor," which is known today as the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

A year later, the Petah Tikvah Anshe Castilla Congregation was formed, but it wasn't until 1968 that the community raised enough money to purchase a synagogue on Brunswick Avenue.

From the community's humble beginning at a JCC, the population of Moroccan Jews in Toronto, which Benzacar estimates is at about 1,100 families, now have plenty of choices.

Petah Tikvah, Magen David Sephardic Congregation, Tiferet Israel Congregation and the Sephardic Kehila Centre are just a few of the synagogues in the Greater Toronto Area that offer the same Sephardic customs the community grew up with in the Northern African country.

Rabbi Amram Assayag, the chief rabbi of the Abir Yaakob congregation at the kehila centre, who came to Toronto from Tangier in 1968 soon after Israel's Six Day War, is also amazed at the community's accomplishments.

"People came here without any religious leadership, contrary to other communities that moved with their rabbis. This community came by themselves and a few people had the vision that there was something to safeguard, and they began a congregation some 50 years ago. There wasn't much hope for anything big. They were happy if they could just continue [praying] in [another shul's] basement," Rabbi Assayag said.

"They have a culture that many years ago we were told that we have no chance to maintain outside of the Sephardic lands, and today, it is not any different than it was in the Sephardic lands... Today, what they experience in Toronto, they never dreamed they could have."

Max Benaim, a Petah Tikvah board member and a Sephardi Jewish community volunteer, said that the Sephardi community wouldn't be as strong today if not for the success of the Petah Tikvah Youth Organization (PTYO).

that kept Moroccans united.

Benaim, who arrived in Toronto 43 years ago in 1964, began volunteering when he was only 15 years old. Soon after, he founded PTYO.

"In our community, in the Spanish-speaking community, it was like a brand name. Everybody knew the name, PTYO... It was the only Sephardic youth organization in the city. We used to do all kinds of social, educational and religious services. And out of that... close to 40 couples got married. That is quite an accomplishment," Benaim said.

"They got married, had children and grandchildren, and they always talk about PTYO and that brand name never disappeared. That's what I'm proud of."

Despite his disappointment that this organization no longer exists and that social programming for his children's generation isn't the focus it was when he was a teenager, Benaim said he is proud of the tight knit Moroccan community he helped build.

Hatred's fellow-travellers

They share the same obsession with and loyalty to an ideology that crowns death and disparages life.

For them, alas, the dream of dismantling Israel has always trumped the dream of building Palestine.

Had the drive to sow and to build overtaken the drive to harm and to destroy, the ideologues might have somehow cast aside their hatred and found a way, these past 60 years, for the sake of their own people, to reconcile with the idea of a sovereign Jewish state.

Co-existence would have surely led to prosperity. But prosperity has been only a fleeting chimera for the Palestinian people. Penury and poverty have been their primary way of life.

In the heady, but short-lived, post-Oslo days, there was a sense that prosperity was within their grasp. Business, commerce, agriculture and tourism expanded and joint ventures among Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians were common place.

But it ended abruptly, a casualty too, of the terror that Yasser Arafat set loose upon the Jews and ultimately, upon his own people.

The Arabs of Israel, perhaps more than any other community in the Middle East, understand the horrible price their co-religionists in the West Bank and Gaza have paid for the duplicity of Palestinian leaders and for the opportunities those leaders have perpetually scorned in favour of the bloodlust dream of destroying the "occupying Zionist entity."

To be sure, Arab citizens of Israel face many unique challenges of identity and discrimination. But there is also no denying that they also benefit from the democracy that is Israeli society and the economy that spins from it.

According to a poll conducted in the first week of December of some 514 Israeli Arabs over the age of 18 by Kevoon Research, Strategy & Communications, a Jerusalem-based public affairs company, "the overwhelmingly majority of Israeli Arabs would prefer to remain Israeli citizens rather than become citizens of a future Palestinian state."

Sixty-two per cent of Israeli Arabs said they would remain Israeli citizens rather than join a future Palestinian State. Only 14 per cent of the respondents said they would choose to join a future Palestinian state; 24 per cent did not express an opinion or refused to answer.

The strongest support for retaining Israeli citizenship was expressed by members of the Druze community, 84 per cent of whom said they would choose Israel.

According to the results, lower income households also showed strong support for holding on to Israeli citizenship with 71 per cent choosing to do so.

Men were more likely than women to choose to remain Israeli citizens (67 per cent vs. 56 per cent). Not surprisingly, the strongest support for becoming citizens of a future Palestinian state was among the students with 21 per cent preferring the Palestinian card of citizenship.

The margin of error in the poll results was 4.5 per cent.

More information on the poll results, can be obtained by emailing the organization at: research@keevon.com

These results are not surprising to anyone familiar with the truth of the way in which the Palestinian people have been led since the Jews embarked upon their own nation-building enterprise trying to live peacefully and to common benefit alongside their Arab neighbours.

From the editor's desk

If news, commentary and punditry were midwives, we could expect the newborn year which they bring to our homes this week to be a bleak child indeed.

I write these words four days before the calendar changes.

The brutal slaying of Benazir Bhutto and some two dozen of her supporters has just been announced. No one has claimed "credit" for the slaughter, but speculation has fallen on the usual suspects, of which there are no shortages - al-Qaeda and a cadre of extremists in the military, to name but two - all of whom share this one bone-chilling trait: they are utterly indifferent to and contemptuous of the sanctity of human life, any human life and all human life, even that of their co-religionists. Wanton killing is both ends and means to them.

Human life is subordinate to ideology. It is a relationship between cause and effect that is the exact obverse of that which underpins our values and our society. We believe human life is served by ideology.

We must shudder at and take direct, hard notice of the Bhutto assassination. We undermine our own country and our own values if we merely shrug at the killings. In every real and immediate sense, the killers are our enemies.

The instability that the Bhutto's assassination will bring to Pakistan was probably intended to affect Afghanistan as well to boost the fortunes of the Taliban and their confederates against the forces of the unbelievers. Canadian troops and their NATO allies are now at greater risk.

It is no exaggeration to say that our soldiers are defending us even as they defend ordinary Afghans trying to cement for them the conditions for safe, stable, secure day-to-day living.

Bhutto's killers are fellow-travellers with the Islamist extremists who daily plot the demise of the Jewish state.

CJC condemns act of anti-Semitism

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A residence in York Region was tagged with graffiti in the form of a swastika, and a car in the driveway was set on fire, police confirmed last month.

The Dec. 18 incident took place at 185 Royal Orchard Blvd. and echoed a rash of anti-Semitic incidents in the region this past October, when nine vehicles parked in front of six homes were painted with swastikas and anti-Semitic and anti-gay insults.

Sgt. Tony Brown of York Regional Police's diversity and cultural services office told The C.J.N. the attack is being investigated as a hate crime, but as of Dec. 19, it was being treated as a stand-alone incident.

The swastika was sprayed on the garage door, but Brown said the home was not a Jewish one.

"It's a crime and we'll investigate it to see what charges will be laid," Brown said. "We'll treat it as an individual [hate crime] until and if we have something more to connect it with [the crimes from October.]. But right now it's just one incident."

Canadian Jewish Congress condemned the attack.

"While we don't yet know the motivation behind this act of violence, the presence of a swastika is always upsetting and of great concern to our community, regardless of whose house it's painted on," said Wendy Lampert, Congress' new national director of community relations.

"In a place where tolerance and openness are values we hold dear... it's something we feel needs to be properly investigated and we're confident that [York Regional Police's] investigation will continue and they will lay the appropriate charges once the perpetrators are found."

Bagel Haven, Golden Chopsticks now under COR supervision

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Bagel Haven, a dairy bagel restaurant, and Golden Chopsticks Chinese restaurant, both located at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue West, are now receiving their kosher certification from the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR).

Both restaurants had been previously supervised by Rabbi Moshe Levy, who operates Mehadrin Kosher.

Michelle Nefsky, who owns Bagel Haven with her husband, Malcolm, said the restaurant had been supervised by Mehadrin since February 2006, and added that she commends Rabbi Levy for his service to the community.

When they were seeking supervision for their restaurant last winter, she said, COR had asked for things that were not realistic, such as having a shomer Shabbat partner and serving cholov Yisroel dairy products.

"Rabbi Levy accepted us for who we are, and he asked how he could help make our dream of running a kosher restaurant a reality."

"We were not trying to make a statement [by not going with COR.] Rabbi Levy followed things that we believe in. We felt [at the time] that COR did not represent the whole community, only the Orthodox. We supported a community supervision but thought it should include everyone."

In recent months, however, COR released a community message from rabbis Mordechai Levin, executive director; Yacov Felder, vice-chair; and Sholom Adler, kashruth administrator, that announced that COR is making changes to policies and practices "with our new vision in mind - a vision of consistency and transparency."

They said that a shomer Shabbat partner is no longer a requirement and a restaurant that does not cater outside is not required to use or serve cholov Yisroel. Adequate signage is necessary to inform consumers that this location is not cholov Yisroel.

Nefsky said they switched to COR only because they needed their business promoted in a way that Rabbi Levy was not able to provide. "We also needed a hechsher that was acceptable to the whole community."

"I always stress that Rabbi Levy did us a great service, and he was a catalyst for change. The only problem was that not enough people knew what he stood for and believed in."

Rabbi Levy said in a telephone interview that the benefit of running a small business is that he is able to supervise his establishments personally. "My business has nothing to do with making money. I want to make it easier for more people to keep kosher."

He cannot understand, he said, why anyone "would be bothered" by his hashgachah. "People do not become confused [from having options.] Those who are serious about keeping kosher can check me out and see that I am 100 per cent kosher."

Reform leader wants to reclaim Shabbat services

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Elliott Jacobson attended his first biennial convention of the Union for Reform Judaism (URJ) in 1993, worship services had much more English, far fewer kipot and talitot, and much less music, he recalls.

Jacobson, now president of the Canadian for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), told The CJN that this year's biennial, held Dec. 11 to 16 in San Diego, had services that were "basically Hebrew," with "very inclusive" music. "There is less performance and more worshipping together."

The changes he noted are reflective of some of the larger issues that were discussed at the convention.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the URJ, in a Saturday sermon at the biennial, urged Reform Jews to revive Shabbat observance. The Shabbat morning service has been appropriated by bar and bat mitzvah families, with the focus more on the child than the community, he said.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai, which had the largest delegation of any congregation in North America with some two dozen people, said that Canadian congregations have a larger participation Saturday morning than Friday night, but that Rabbi Yoffie's comments still resonate here.

At Temple Sinai, which has already begun a monthly initiative to bring in more people on Shabbat morning by offering study and enrichment, Rabbi Yoffie's ideas "will strengthen something that we've already brought into."

Rabbi Michael Dolgin

Rabbi Dolgin expressed his pleasure at related changes in the Reform movement. "It's wonderful to see that prayer has become a central part of Reform congregations. Where once people looked forward to the [biennial] sessions, now they look forward to the davening."

Although Canadian delegates, numbering about 110, made up a small proportion of the 5,000 attendees, issues such as membership recruitment and retention and finding ways to reach out to men — who, according to JTA, are less active in non-Orthodox synagogues than women — are big issues here as well as in the United States, said Rabbi Sharon Sobel, executive director of the CCRJ, which represents 26 congregations. There are more than 800 Reform congregations in the United States.

"It's our job to show we can enrich [members'] lives," Rabbi Sobel said, referring to social, educational and spiritual aspects of congregational life.

Interestingly, services at the biennial used ideas borrowed from evangelical megachurches, a trend championed by Ron Wolfson, co-founder of Synagogue 3000, a Los Angeles-based organization dedicated to synagogue revitalization.

The ideas included music-driven services, new technologies, and a warm, welcoming atmosphere.

With the help of large screens, participants "never feel like they're far removed from the people leading the service," said Rabbi Sobel.

Rabbi Yoffie's speech also called for greater support for Israel and more dialogue with Muslims through the Islamic Society of North America, an initiative in which Mississauga's Solel Congregation is involved.

One issue that is particular to the Canadian Reform movement is the size of the country. "We are the largest [geographic] region, but the smallest in number of congregations," said Rabbi Sobel. Most of those congregations are in Toronto, or within driving distance of it.

"How do we connect our Reform congregations to each other and to Toronto so they don't feel we're so Toronto-centric?" she asked. She believes an event like the biennial is one opportunity to address that issue by bringing representatives of far-flung congregations, including some in Vancouver, Calgary and Winnipeg, together.

The next biennial, in 2009, will be held in Toronto.

THE MODERN MACCABI: Nearly 50 students gathered last month at The House — an upper-level storefront that offers programs for Jewish young people — for an interactive lecture by Ami Ayalon (centre), an Israeli cabinet minister and former commander of the Shin Bet, Israel's security service. During the lecture, which was also sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto, Ayalon shared stories about his experiences in the Shin Bet and spoke about his vision of Israel's future.

JIAS Toronto celebrates 85 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

JIAS Toronto celebrated its 85th anniversary last month with a concert at Leah Posluns Theatre featuring the talents of former JIAS clients.

Called A Journey Around the World Through Music and the Arts, the concert featured a wide variety of entertainment, including traditional Jewish melodies, contemporary Hebrew songs, jazz, classical music, ancient Ladino tunes, martial arts and ballroom dancing.

Joanna Sasson Morrison, who is responsible for community integration at JIAS, said that in planning its anniversary event, the organization wanted to do something that "acknowledged the immigrants' arrival in a way that the story would come from them."

The concert also included video clips of immigrants and culminated with the premiere of the agency's new video, One Community for All: The Heritage of JIAS Toronto.

Seen performing at the JIAS concert are sister and brother, Julia and Alexander Mirzoev, while father, Mikhail, turns the pages for his son.

On display in the lobby was a photographic exhibit prepared by four teens who participate in JIAS's youth group.

Janis Roth, JIAS executive director, said that the exhibit portrayed the teens views on beginning a new life. "Showed from the 'I' point of view, the pictures tell a story of what it means to re-establish themselves.

"One teen had a picture of a gazelle climbing a mountain, and said that being an immigrant is like climbing a mountain."

It is significant, Roth said, that everyone who took part in the evening, produced by David Waldman, spent a lot of time at rehearsals. "They are busy looking for work and getting settled [in their new homes] but they found the time to help make our evening a success. They put a lot of themselves into it. David, who also volunteered his time, had a vision of the event, and he met with the entertainers. It was wonderful."

A message that came out over and over, Roth said, was that JIAS has always been the gateway to immigration. "It is there to greet and assist, and it was obvious from the energy in the room that its tradition of caring and support is still very strong."

In the commemorative journal distributed to all guests, Jane Katkova, who came to Canada in 1992, said, "Immigration is never easy. You don't know how to connect to this new world. You're surrounded by different trees, driving on unknown streets, seeing unfamiliar faces. You need a place to seek advice and a smile. That's what JIAS does."

Roth said that JIAS's role has changed over the years. "Eighty-five years ago, its role was all about settlement - assisting with food and shelter. The focus now is getting people connected with the community. Without that, we would have a disengaged, unaffiliated group. If we offer more when they arrive, the [community] benefits."

Sharon Cohen, president of JIAS Toronto, said in the commemorative journal that the immigrants themselves have also changed over the years. "Most of today's immigrants have applied as skilled workers, and are generally well educated, compared with the previous waves of immigrants, many of whom were refugees arriving under duress."

Roth said that although a lot of people prepare for their immigration ahead of time, when they arrive it is still a huge shock. "That is why our help is so important."

"[We have found] that recently, immigrants are determined early on to become part of the community. They have expectations, and assume that the Jewish community has programs for their family."

Roth said that one of "my great JIAS" moments was when one of the settlement workers in the office who is from Mexico spoke to an immigrant couple in fluent Yiddish. "They needed to find a common language, and Yiddish was it."

Sasson Morrison said that JIAS encourages immigrants to maintain their own culture while, at the same time, crossing over to the community at large. "The focus is about becoming part of a bigger community that has respect and place for everyone."

Past president Vickie Dombrowsky said in the commemorative journal that immigration is essential. "As the baby boom generation ages and birth numbers dwindle, immigration within all communities is important to build a stronger Canadian society. The established Jewish community must recognize how vital newcomers are to their own survival - and must learn to accept them and include them in their own lives."

"In the video, there were three families celebrating Shabbat, each in their own way," Sasson Morrison said. "One Shabbat can be reflected in three ways."

Hudna hoodwink

At the start of the cabinet meeting on December 23, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert declared "Counter-terrorist operations [in Gaza] will continue as they have for months. There is no other way to describe what is happening in the Gaza Strip except as a true war between the IDF and terrorist elements. This war will continue even as we take strict care, as we have up to now, to avoid a humanitarian crisis which could harm civilians who are uninvolved in terrorism."

The week before Olmert's statement in the cabinet, the IDF struck down the head of the Islamic Jihad in the Gaza Strip and one of his key associates. Some 10 other Jihadist operatives were also killed by the Israeli army.

Last week the IDF struck against the leadership of the terror infrastructure in Gaza, killing eight terrorists, including the head of rocket and explosive manufacturing for Islamic Jihad in Gaza.

It is clear that the Israeli security services are penetrating the highest echelons of the Gaza's extremist military apparatus. And those who dwell within those echelons are obviously worried. The military and economic pressure on Hamas are having an effect.

How else to explain the message to Israel by Gaza's Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh, conveyed to a television reporter, that Hamas is ready to enter into a hudna, a temporary ceasefire, with Israel. Haniyeh's spokesman, Taher Nunu, elaborated: "Israel should stop its attacks and siege," Nunu said. "Then a truce would be possible, and not unlikely."

But the request for a hudna should be rejected.

Later this month, Hamas will commemorate the second anniversary of its electoral victory over the Palestinian Authority led by Mahmoud Abbas. They are very obviously intent on being able to show their people and a wider extremist, rejectionist Islamic public that they have successfully withstood both Israeli and international pressure. Israel should resist giving the radical movement more reason to celebrate by agreeing to a hudna.

Now that the military and economic measures appear to be bending Hamas resolve, those measures should not be lessened or lifted.

At that same cabinet meeting on December 23, Olmert told his colleagues that "this policy [of counter-terrorism in Gaza] requires both patience and fortitude. The State of Israel has no interest in negotiating with elements that do not accept the Quartet's basic principles. Thus we have declared and thus we will continue. This is true regarding Hamas, Islamic Jihad and all other elements. Whoever accepts the Quartet principles will be—in principle—a partner for negotiations. Whoever is unwilling to do so, to our regret, cannot be a partner for dialogue. This policy will not change."

A hudna may achieve a temporary respite but at the cost of greater killing down the road. If Hamas will not agree to live side by side with Israel, they should not be afforded the opportunity to broaden their arsenal and make more deadly their weapons under the guise of a hudna. It is simply a form of hoodwink.

25 years ago in The CJN

Controversy raged in the Jewish community about reaction to the Sabra/Shatila massacre. Debate centred on whether Jews in the Diaspora have the right to publicly criticize Israel at all, and what tone that criticism should take. Three Boston rabbis formed themselves into a beit din, and excommunicated several rabbis and academics, including well-known dissident Noah Chomsky, a professor at MIT, who placed a virulently anti-Israel ad in the New York Times.

B'nai Brith 'battle'

The "battle" that you refer to in "Battle Brewing at B'nai Brith Canada" (CJN, Dec. 6) is an internal matter that has been settled by B'nai Brith International's 164 year old Court of Appeals system, as mandated by the B'nai Brith constitution.

B'nai Brith International fully endorses B'nai Brith Canada's leadership, both volunteer and professional, and commends the organization for its outstanding work in combating anti-Semitism and racism, and for its superb government relations, pro-Israel advocacy and its affordable housing and community volunteer service programs. B'nai Brith Canada is a valued member of the B'nai Brith International family.

B'nai Brith continues to play a vital role in ensuring the welfare of Canada's Jewish community and the global Jewish community. The appeals process provided a forum for B'nai Brith members to express their concerns. The process, which has served our organization well since 1843, has now run its course. We stand by the decision and look forward to getting back to our good works.

'Sanitized' language in The CJN

Almost weekly I receive a request from Honest Reporting Canada or the Media Action Group to write a letter to the CBC or the Globe and Mail, Toronto Star or other Canadian media outlets to protest their anti-Israel bias, often reflected by their use of "sanitized" language when describing terrorist attacks and how they bend over backward to avoid using the word "terrorist," and instead call Hamas, or Islamic Jihad, "militants" or "insurgents," etc.

So I was very disturbed to read in The CJN's Dec. 20 front-page story, "Sderot endures Qassam rocket strikes," a horrific description of the impact of the bombardment of Sderot, "by an almost daily barrage of Qassam rockets fired by Palestinian militants in Gaza." Later in the same piece, we read that since the start of the second intifadah, these "gunmen" have fired nearly 6,000 Qassams and mortars at Sderot.

If our own Jewish media and journalists are guilty of using such euphemisms for the word "terrorist" in their writing, how can we expect anything more from the CBC or other Canadian newspapers?

From She'arim's child study team

We, the child study team at She'arim Hebrew Day School, are very concerned about the future of Jewish education for Toronto's special education students ("She'arim parents fear school will close if funding ends," CJN, Dec. 20).

For the past 26 years, She'arim has provided its hundreds of students and graduates with the tools, strategies and academic and emotional support needed to be successful. Our graduates have moved on to secondary and post-secondary education and fulfilling careers.

We use various therapies and techniques in our small classes (a maximum of nine students). She'arim sees itself working with the whole child. Our students develop self-esteem and a love of learning.

The possibility for our students to remain within the Jewish education system is a responsibility of the community. Without a setting like She'arim, we believe our students will be denied the chance of a Jewish education.

From a former She'arim student

I'm currently in Grade 12 and planning on going to York University when I graduate. She'arim Hebrew Day School is responsible for my ability to succeed at TanenbaumCHAT ("She'arim parents fear school will close if funding ends," CJN, Dec. 20).

I spent four years at She'arim, where I learned the necessary strategies to get the high marks I'm currently achieving. When I heard that She'arim might close next year, I was very upset. Why should the students who can't function in mainstream day schools not have the opportunity for a proper Jewish education? I can assure you that had I not gone to She'arim, I probably wouldn't be completing my day school education.

I hope that Mercatz (formerly the Board of Jewish Education) doesn't decide to close She'arim down. You may not end up knowing if your child needs to go there until it's too late.

Nu? Aren't there enough Yiddishisms already?

By HOWARD RICHLER

While some languages such as French treasure chastity, the bawdy English language tends to sleep with whomever it finds most attractive. Since the 20th century, one of its most common bedmates has been Yiddish, and, as a result, countless Yiddishisms, such as "bagel" and "kibbitz" now pepper the mainstream vernacular. (I am defining Yiddishism as a linguistic feature influenced or derived from Yiddish. Many words that are deemed Yiddishisms actually derive from Hebrew, and occasionally from Slavic languages.)

Yiddishisms probably came of age in North America more than 75 years ago because of the dual influence of Borscht Belt comedians such as Myron Cohen, George Burns and Milton Berle, and Jewish producers and directors in Hollywood.

Sometimes Yiddishisms even popped up in mainstream humour. Most children watching the Three Stooges, who were popular between the mid-1930s and mid-1950s, probably didn't realize it, but a grasp of Yiddish was required for a full understanding of many of their jokes. In one episode, when Larry hears that Moe is heading to a hock-shop, he says, "While you're there, hock me a tshaynik!" What must have sounded like pure nonsense to most viewers was in fact a Yiddish pun. A tshaynik is a teakettle, and hak, (or huk), comes from a verb meaning "to knock."

The connection comes from reflecting on a boiling teakettle. The more it boils, the emptier it gets, and the louder and more mad-deningly the lid bangs. The very popular phrase "Hak mir nisht kein cheinik" literally means "Don't knock me a teakettle." Figuratively, however, it means, "You don't have to shut up altogether, but I'd really appreciate it if you'd stop prattling on incessantly."

So by the 1960s, when Johnny Carson used to describe his accountant as H. & R. Goniñ, he knew that would get a laugh, and not just from a Jewish audience.

Still, as a Jewish person living in Canada, I am surprised by the plethora of Yiddish usage. In 1997, I started to notice a plot to "Yinglishize" my mother tongue by members outside my tribe. That year, I phoned then-Montreal Gazette books editor Bryan Demchinsky, who is of Ukrainian descent, to see if he had received a book I wanted to review. The book in question was titled The Bible Code, and it purported some narishkayt that there were coded messages hidden inside the Torah that predicted events such as the bombing of the Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City on April 19, 1995 and the assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin on Nov. 4, 1995.

Demchinsky told me he had perused the book, and that in his opinion, "it looked like a bunch of druck." This astounded me, but not because I held a contrary view of the book. No! What stunned me was the editor's knowledge of the word druck.

I then noted this phenomenon had become common among other Gazette staffers. On Aug. 21, 1999, columnist Don MacPherson wrote "Perhaps [then-] Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard was just trying to avoid unnecessary turris at the next meeting of the Parti Québécois-national council."

I soon realized the ubiquity of Yinglish. Some years ago, I caught the following written by Elizabeth Renzetti in the Globe and Mail: "I know that he was once fat, on the precipice of obese, and dreading sailing off into the floaty stage, the point at which the zafitig give up all fashion sense and begin dressing like Mama Cass." Around the same time Maureen Dowd stated in the New York Times that U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney and his aides "shoehorned all their meshugas about Saddam's aluminum tubes, weapons labs and al Qaeda links into [then secretary of state Colin] Powell's UN speech."

The Feb. 21, 2005, edition of Time magazine featured this line by J.F.O. McAllister on the then-upcoming marriage of Prince Charles and Camilla Parker Bowles. "Last week there were a few signs of apathy in the sea of schmaltz about enduring love." Also in 2005, Liam Lacey reviewed the movie Prime in the Globe & Mail. It was headlined "What a shemozzle" and Lacey painted Meryl Streep as a stereotypical Jewish mother: "She kvetches, plotzes, gets verklemp and all those other Yiddish things."

Given the tendency in the media, I was not too surprised in 1998 when then-U.S. president Bill Clinton referred to then-treasury secretary Robert Rubin as using a "sort of cold shick when he talks economics."

But now, even quintessential Wasps such as Stephen Harper have jumped on the shickwag- on. In June 2007, when asked whether he'd follow Paul Martin's example as leader and have a private meeting with U2's Bono, he announced that "it's not my shick to talk to rock stars."

Of course, many times Yinglish isn't so much used as it's misused. This is often rather amusing, because not every Yinglish term rolls off every Gentile tongue with panache.

In an episode of his short-lived 1998 sitcom George & Leo, Bob Newhart pronounces his pal a smuck. When I was in business some years ago, I remember once kibbitzing with a secretary named Anna, who was of Italian and Yugoslavian heritage. In response to a joke I related, she responded, "Howie, you're such a shmuck." I gave her a chance to recant and asked if she really wanted to call me a shmuck, and she timidly replied, "Doesn't it mean joker?"

Around the same time, I had a black customer in Brooklyn who, when he was under a lot of pressure, was prone to saying "I'm shivitz-ing."

Some years ago, before the Canadian Alliance Party had been created, then-Reform Party backbench MP Lee Morrison, from Saskatchewan, wanted to refer to then-human resources minister Jane Stewart's gall. But I guess he felt that the word "gall" wasn't strong enough, so he said, "You got to admire the jutsper of the minister of Human Resources." Parliament realized a travesty had been committed on the Yiddish language and convulsed in laughter.

Then-Liberal MP Herb Gray, who happens to be Jewish, responded that he had two words to describe Morrison's question: "Gornisht and absolute narishkayt." This again less the distinguished members, notwithstanding the fact hardly anybody understood what Gray had said. This caused then-Speaker Gib Parent to pitch in with, "Order please. I have no way of knowing whether these words are unparliamentary."

But why are there so many Yinglish terms in English? While certain words, such as naches were absorbed into English because they introduce a new concept, there are many Yinglish terms that aren't really needed. For example, English has many derogatory words for people, but shlemiel, shlemazel, shmegeggy, shmendrick, shmo, shmuck, shlub, shlump, shnook, shvartzer, putz, pisher, nudnik, noodge, nebbish, meshugene, klutz and kvetch roll off non-Jewish tongues with glee. Sprinkling one's English with Yiddishisms seems to be considered hip, particularly in North America.

Nor are we talking only about vocabulary. The speech patterns of Montreal Jews contain many Yiddish characteristics, and sometimes they even affect our grammar. My daughter, Jennifer, was apprised of her sub-standard English during her first year at Yale University. Jennifer was enjoying a nosh with her dorm mates, some of whom were Jewish, when she exclaimed, "This cake is so good! You want?" This generosity was greeted with consternation by her roommates. Notwithstanding that Jennifer was majoring at the time in linguistics, she was informed by her peers that this sentence didn't correspond to the elementary grammar that had been drummed into them over the past 15 years. After all, it lacked a direct object.

This conversational style, though, is quite common among Montreal anglophones who are Jewish. If asked by someone whether a particular object is available in Montreal, a Jewish person might answer, "You could find." If asked whether dessert is included in the price of a meal, the answer might be, "It comes with." This lack of a direct object follows the grammatical structure of the Yiddish expression, "Es kumt mit."

In addition, it's common to respond to a question with another question, which is often peppered with an implied or stated complaint. Hence the seemingly innocuous question, "How are you?" could elicit, "How should I be with my knees?"

It's difficult to transcend roots. In my aforementioned years in business, I had a non-Jewish business associate from Massachusetts with whom I became quite friendly, and we would regularly shoot the breeze over the phone.

Often, in response to some wry comment he made, I answered him by saying "Go know!" After years of using this expression, finally he said to me one day, in an exasperated tone, "Howie, you keep saying, 'Go know' to me. What the hell do you mean?"

I was surprised that he didn't know what I meant, so when I got home, I checked in my Joy's of Yiddish by Leo Rosten. Under the heading "Go Know," it stated, "Yinglish. From the Yiddish expression 'Gey vays' (meaning, 'go know')." It said the expression could mean "How could I know?", "How could you expect me to know?" or "How could anyone know?" Probably if I had said "Go figure," my friend would have known what I meant.

Go know?

Getting there isn't any fun

Travel used to be fun for me. It no longer is.

Going to unfamiliar places, seeing new sites and embracing new experiences still is. But getting there is not.

Norma Baumele Joseph in Montreal

I have travelled a great deal lately, especially between Montreal and New York. I would rather drive than fly. How do business travellers manage with all these hassles?

Security means arriving at the airport earlier. No complaints if it's necessary, but it adds hardships. I especially dislike taking off my shoes and walking barefoot on dirty floors. But that is the least of the problems. Long lines are to be expected.

But what about the cancellations? Yesterday, my son was told that his flight was cancelled due to bad weather. Well, what can you do about that, right? But the call came on Wednesday for a Thursday flight! How did they know on Wednesday morning that Thursday night there would be bad weather? No weather report I've ever heard is that reliable.

Airlines often cancel if they don't have a full plane or some such thing. So due to "weather" or the ever-present "mechanical problem," we are often left scrambling for new flights.

My son tried for a refund. Three calls told him absolutely no refund. Then a fourth agent produced a 100 per cent refund! Go figure.

The hassle of it all — long lines, perverse connections and harried agents — all make for an unpleasant experience.

Stress!

Airports are all about rushing in order to wait. Hurry up, get in line, wait — that describes much of what goes on. Walk for miles, run and then get in another line and wait.

But one of the most perplexing aspects of airline travel is the cost of tickets. I firmly believe that each seat on a plane has a different price tag. Next time you travel, ask your seat mate what they paid.

When my husband and I flew to Toronto, we had to return earlier than planned. There was no cost to change his ticket. But my seat, right next to his, booked at the same time, paid for at the same time, on the same credit card (you get the picture), was of a different class and couldn't be changed!

Prices fluctuate. Recent trips to New York have varied from less than $400 to more than $1,000. Week to week. One week the proposed flight would have taken me to Florida or Calgary first! I was able to fly to New York via Ottawa and Florida for less than the cost of a round-trip Montreal-to-New York fare.

And some carriers cost much more than others.

Surely some form of regulation or stabilization is called for. At the very least, it's buyer, beware, and remember that travel agents can ease the situation.

Travel is enriching and often necessary. But getting there is no fun. Pity!

Teaching Christians how we Jews fish

From time to time, our synagogue hosts visiting church groups who want to learn about Judaism. Sometimes they come during the week and take a tour of the shul and look at items in our Judaica museum. Often we take out the Torah so that they can see the form of the scroll. We tell them about the services and the way a scroll is written, and about how we chant the weekly or special portions.

Sometimes they come on Shabbat, wanting to experience the actual worship service. Since our service is in Hebrew, we have devised a way they can participate in part of the morning service, including the Torah reading, and then go with a congregant to get further explanation and ask questions. Then they join the congregation for the rabbi's teaching before the kiddush, which they are invited to share with us.

Recently, a Danish Lutheran church group arranged for a Shabbat visit. They came wanting answers to three questions. The questions were well chosen. They caused us to consider our own beliefs and practices in light of how we explain them to non-Jews who are deeply committed to their own faith.

The questions they wanted discussed were: how does Judaism affect daily life; how do we celebrate Shabbat; and what makes something holy (or not)?

The group attended our Shabbat morning service, coincidentally on the Shabbat of Chanukah. Thus they got a forceful impression of the service—one that included Hallel, which, although in Hebrew, they did enjoy — of course the liberal use of the word "halallelah" gave them some idea of what was going on. They remained in the service for part of the Torah reading, which continued the Joseph saga — a familiar story to all — and then adjourned for a discussion of the issues that their questions had raised.

Shabbat rules are simple to explain in theory — the minutiae were left as an exercise, as we used to say, to the reader. It seemed more important to stress Shabbat as a time for reflection, for concentration on study and prayer.

But how does Judaism affect daily life? Where to begin? We gave them examples taken from a variety of commandments — after explaining that a "mitzvah" is not merely a good deed done when the spirit moves, but something incumbent on us whether it's convenient or not.

We stressed that in Judaism there is no firm boundary between the daily and the sacred. For example, one should not open a business close to a similar one if it will detract from the original business. One must give charity, the highest standard being the act of freeing the recipient from the need to accept charity. In other words, don't hand out fish — teach the person how to catch a fish.

We talked about speech, and the critical importance attached to words and how they can destroy or create. They learned the form of a brachah whereby we imply that God is present in the act we are about to perform.

But the hardest part was defining what, in Judaism, is, or makes, something holy. Christianity has sacraments that invest human acts with sanctity — marriage, baptism, communion. We have no such sacramental tradition. So how to explain our approach to the transcendent?

Martin Buber taught that in Judaism the division is between the holy and the not-yet-holy. Everything can be holy if its potential for holiness is realized. Our role is to bring God into the world, to make the ordinary become holy through our actions.

Thus it is not through a particular sacrament that holiness enters the world, but through the actions of humankind. And, unfortunately, what mankind defiles through action or through word takes holiness out of the world.

For centuries, Christianity saw Judaism as a barren, rule-bound, law-encumbered religion inferior to the New Covenant of love. It is my hope that this brief encounter with us as a living people taught the visiting church group that Judaism is a vital religion of word and deed, and that both Jew and Christian have beliefs that, translated into action, can repair the broken world we live in, and make the not-yet-holy a place of sanctity for all.

In Canada, issues have arisen that challenge the relationship between religious and secular society, and raise questions about the nature of Canadian multiculturalism. While these issues reinforce the importance of protecting minority religious rights, in some cases they demonstrate how, for some, assertions of religious freedom can lead to dysfunctional consequences.

Recently, the notion of reasonable accommodation came to public attention in the province of Quebec as a societal response to issues of minority religious assertions. In one example, chassidic Jews objected to the public visibility of women exercising in a fitness facility. In response to religious sensibilities, the facility voluntarily covered its windows.

As in this case, most of the instances that have given rise to the discussion of reasonable accommodation have been settled through voluntary measures. However, some issues need to be resolved through the courts. For example, the objection raised by Hutterites in Alberta to mandatory photographs on drivers' licences will shortly be heard by the Supreme Court of Canada.

In response to this debate, the Quebec government created the ill-conceived Bouchard/Taylor Commission on reasonable accommodation. The commission has recently completed its hearings and will be reporting in March 2008. The work of the commission, however, has led to two unfortunate consequences.

First, it conducted some of its hearings through a series of "town hall" meetings that, like radio phone-in shows, encouraged participants to vent bigoted views without restraint. Many of those views reflected anti-immigration attitudes akin to those in the now-famous Herouxville code of conduct for newcomers.

Secondly, the proposals made in response to the commission by some Quebec political parties raise some concerns. For example, the Quebec government has proposed and has begun the process of amending the Quebec Charter of Rights granting primacy of one right over another. More specifically, it will create a hierarchy of rights, giving priority to gender equality over freedom of religion. Some Jewish organizations have opposed this measure.

In addition, the Quebec Liberal party proposed that, as part of the immigration process, newcomers be required to sign a "moral commitment" to the province's core values.

Most recently, the Parti Québécois has suggested that the Quebec Charter of Rights be amended to permit the courts to protect and promote Quebec culture. It also advocates the promotion of Christian tradition by the display of symbols, like the crucifix, in state institutions.

Ironically, rather than developing a legal formula to deal with issues of reasonable accommodation, the commission's work to date promotes majoritarian values and predictably will result in diminished accommodation for minority religious beliefs and practices.

Over the past two years, policy-makers have wrestled with the issue of the role of religious law in an otherwise secular society. Specifically, this matter arose in the context of a proposed amendment to Ontario's Arbitration Act. This amendment would have allowed the use of sharia, or Islamic law, to deal with primarily matrimonial issues. After much discussion, the Ontario Government chose to disallow the use of all religious law in any formal proceedings. This, however, has not precluded the private use of sharia, Halachah or any religious law by those who strongly adhere to religious legal dictates.

In a recent decision, the Supreme Court of Canada (Braker vs. Marcovitz) dealt specifically with issues of Jewish halachic law involving the withholding of a get and other related matters. What is most significant in this case is that religious law is subject to the review and scrutiny of our domestic courts. In fact, despite his reliance on Halachah, the husband argued that his rights were infringed under the Quebec Charter of Rights.

Although the argument did not succeed, this case underscores that religious law is itself subject to regular domestic law.

Moreover, the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada held that Canada rightly prides itself on its evolutionary tolerance for diversity and pluralism. This journey has included a growing appreciation for multiculturalism, including the recognition that ethnic, religious or cultural differences will be acknowledged and respected. However, not all differences are compatible with Canada's fundamental values and, accordingly, not all barriers to their expression are arbitrary.

As a society that is vibrant, multicultural and secular, we must strike a delicate balance. While we must respect and accommodate differences, we must also recognize the competing values that reflect the principles of equality and justice applicable to all.

Israel's last frontier finally being developed

Go south, implored David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister. In 1956, when Israel marked its eighth anniversary of statehood, he warned that unless it developed the Negev Desert, comprising almost two-thirds of its land mass, Israel would be hard-pressed to "ensure the security of the state or achieve economic independence."

Convinced that its future lay in the sands, gravel plains and mountains of the Negev, Israel's last frontier, he heeded his own advice and settled in Sde Boker, a kibbutz facing a spectacular desert crater. But Ben-Gurion was no naïf. As he put it, "Populating [it] is impossible unless we change our priorities."

Israelis paid only lip service to his admonition, content to live on the verdant coastal plain, in Jerusalem and in the lower Galilee. The Israeli government all but ignored Ben-Gurion's Zionist rhetoric, pouring scarce resources into building settlements in the West Bank and other areas conquered during the 1967 Six Day War. As a result, the Negev used by the Israeli army and air force as a training ground – remains virtually empty today, with only eight per cent of Israel's population residing there. As Israel prepares to mark 60 years of statehood this coming spring, 92 per cent of Israelis live on 40 per cent of the land.

This situation has begun to change since the government, spearheaded by the Jewish National Fund – an organization that has played a vital role in developing the country – took the decision to build 25 new communities in the Negev.

Zukim, 120 kilometres north of Eilat, is one of them. A village whose single-family dwellings blend harmoniously into its surroundings, Zukim sits on a bluff in Wadi Zofar, deep in the desiccated Arava Valley and facing the purplish mountains of Jordan. "We're the first new settlement in these parts in the past 25 years," said Tete Dagani, who manages the project.

Dagani, 50, was born in Kiryat Ata, near Haifa, and lived in Hod Hasharon, close to Tel Aviv, before moving down here with his wife and two children in the summer of 2004. They were among the first three families to settle in Zukim, whose infrastructure was laid out by the Jewish National Fund. There are 25 families in Zukim today, and 150 are expected to join them within a few years. The region is sparsely populated. Excluding Eilat, only about 900 families reside in the Arava, which stretches southward from the Dead Sea.

Zukim, overlooking a stunning vista of untouched wadis and canyons and practically within shouting distance of a Canadian-funded flood-water reservoir, intends to be a tourist destination. "We'll have bed-and-breakfast places, two spas, restaurants and shops," said Dagani, who runs a construction inspection business on the side. "And we'll offer desert tours with jeeps, horses and donkeys. We'll sell isolation, relaxation and the power of nature."

In Hod Hasharon, he and his wife, a landscape architect, had a big house and a good life, but the frenzied pace and clutter turned them off. In Zukim, where a nice cottage with a modest garden sells for $150,000, peace of mind is the leitmotif.

The Daganis have adjusted, though their daughter needed several months to acclimatize herself to this wilderness. "Now she thanks me for having brought her here," he said. His son, a strapping fellow, said that making new friends in the Arava is a snap.

Despite its attractions, life can be hard in the Arava. It takes Dagani's wife two hours to commute by plane to Tel Aviv, but the sweltering dry heat seems to pose no problem. "I suffer more from the humidity," said Dagani, who believes that Israel should focus its energies in the Negev rather than in the contested West Bank. "Instead of fighting with the Arabs for a few dunams, we should be settling the Negev."

In the western Negev, in the remote Halutza area south of the Gaza Strip, adjacent to Israel's border with Egypt, the government is building a chain of settlements near existing ones such as Avshalom, Yevul and Nizana. Elisha Mizrachi, the district forester, said that they will be ready for occupancy next year now that the infrastructure has been completed by the Jewish National Fund.

This is a bleak and generally neglected region of low sand dunes. Until recently, the army used it as a firing and training zone, said Gabi Benisti, a Jewish National Fund forester who supervised the planting of 50,000 trees – eucalyptus, pine, tamarisk, fig, almond and olive in the vicinity.

During the Oslo peace process era, there was speculation that Israel, in proposed land swaps with the Palestinian Authority, might exchange Halutza for major settlement blocs in the West Bank. But such talk is rarely, if ever, heard these days.

The new communities are being built mainly for Jewish settlers uprooted from Gush Katif settlements in Gaza under Ariel Sharon's 2005 unilateral withdrawal. According to Mizrachi, the plan was in place before the disengagement was announced.

They will build their own homes with government compensation funds. Up to 15 per cent of the evacuees will resume their work as farmers. The rest will commute to distant jobs.

"This land is excellent for agriculture," said Benisti, noting that the soil is composed of sand and loess, blown in from the Nile delta. Winter vegetables, fruit and citrus will be grown. The Jewish National Fund levelled the terrain for fields and greenhouses. Since this is an exceedingly arid area, he added, a combination of fresh water and treated sewage water will be used.

Mizrachi said that established settlements, from Telme Yosef to Degel, regard the new outposts like a breath of fresh air.

Though resourceful and inventive, farmers in the Negev need a helping hand. The Central and Northern Arava Research and Development Station in Hazeva, 150 kilometres north of Eilat and underwritten by the government, the Jewish National Fund and the Jewish Agency, fills that need by providing the latest information on crops, strains of cut flowers, water usage, pest control methods and so on, said Ran Segev, a biologist in charge of its aquaculture unit.

"In terms of weather, this is Israel's best area for agriculture," said Segev, who specializes in raising ornamental tropical fish. "Ninety per cent of the inhabitants of the Arava make a living from farming." Consequently, the Arava accounts for 60 per cent of Israel's fresh produce and 15 per cent of its cut flowers.

Farther south, on Kibbutz Grofit founded in 1966, inhabited by some 50 families and living off a variety of agricultural exports ranging from melons to dates – two Canadians are riding high. Kathy Shoval, a Montrealer, and Ami Bonder, a Torontonian, are employed as therapists at the Red Mountain Therapeutic Riding Center, whose trails were built by the Jewish National Fund. A joint venture of the kibbutz and the Hevel Eilat Regional Council, it was founded in 1996. It is one of 10 such centres in Israel, but the only one south of Be'er Sheva. Its raison d'être is to assist people handicapped by cerebral palsy, emotional and behavioural disorders and learning disabilities.

Shoval, 39, made aliyah in 1988. She lives on Yotvata, a nearby settlement famous for its dairy products, while Bonder, 24, a resident of Grofit, immigrated to Israel a little more than two years ago. "The work we do here is very fulfilling," said Shoval. "It's great to help someone feel good about themselves." Bonder, whose father, Daryl, is a horse veterinarian, loves what he described as "the supportive and stress-free lifestyle" of the kibbutz. But they admit that coping with extreme weather can be difficult.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Each of us always has God's attention

By RABBI YOSSE MICHALOWICZ

This week's parshah marks the beginning of the Exodus process. It begins with the 10 plagues – specifically the first plague of blood. We know that the beginning sets the tone for what comes after. We will look into this first plague and see what message of freedom it sends to the Jewish People.

In Exodus, Chapter 7, the Almighty tells Aaron to strike the Nile River. In verse 20, it says: "All the water that was in the river changed to blood; the fish that were in the water died, and the river became foul. Egypt could not drink water from the river, and the blood was throughout the land of Egypt."

The Midrash tells us how far-reaching this plague was. It got to the point where the Egyptians really wanted water and they couldn't get any. But they realized that the Jews did have water – the water pitchers in Jewish homes were filled and the Egyptians saw them drinking water. Out of frustration, an Egyptian would grab hold of a jug belonging to a Jew and start drinking. But, lo and behold, the water turned to blood. When the Egyptian gave the jug back to the Jew, the blood became water once again.

The Egyptians got smart. They would say to the Jews, "Come here – we'll drink the water together." But even though each one was drinking from the same pitcher at the same time, the Jew would be drinking water and the Egyptian would be drinking blood.

What was the message for the Jew who was experiencing this miraculous turn of events?

If God does a miracle across the board, certainly no one is going to think that the miracle was done just for him. For example, when the Jews crossed the Sea of Reeds, it was a miracle. What did every Jew think at that moment? They thought: "I sure hope God isn't looking at me too closely, because if He does, He'll probably throw me into the sea along with the Egyptians, because I'm no better than the Egyptians." They probably wanted to cover their faces and get to the other side before God noticed anything about them. When a group miracle happens, we feel that God loves the Jewish People as a whole, but doesn't necessarily love little ol' me.

Rabbinic Reflections

events?

But when a miracle happens so that when you're drinking the very same jug of water that the Egyptian is drinking, and the very same water turns to blood for the Egyptian, we understand that God is singling out each and every Jew!

With the first plague, the Jew was suddenly transported back to the world of the First Man before the sin. It was at that point that every Jew felt that God had created the whole world just for him, and that Hashem was tampering with all the rules of nature just for him. Each Jew experienced this miracle, because each Jew drank the water at the same time as the Egyptian. Otherwise, he wouldn't have noticed that God was making a miracle specifically for him.

We learn from this that redemption begins when the Jew can absorb the feeling that Hashem, our loving God, is watching us and caring for us all the time. The Jew should be able to say, "The world is here just for me." Only when a Jew realizes that he always has God's attention, and all his actions do make a difference, can he have hope to self-actualize and develop a meaningful relationship with God through the freedom he is about to receive.

A timely reminder about 'women's issues'

Dec. 6 this year was just an ordinary Thursday. That's the problem.

On Dec. 6, 1989, a young man murdered 14 women on the campus of Montreal's Ecole Polytechnique because he was "fed up" with the advances women had made in engineering. He was upset about affirmative action, which guaranteed a fair chance to women. He was tired of the constant attention to "women's issues."

Since 1989, there have been yearly memorials on Dec. 6 to mark that tragic event. Dec. 6 is a date seared into many Canadian women's minds.

Yet Dec. 6 seems to go by awfully quietly in most of the Jewish community. I can remember only one memorial service in a synagogue offered by a Jewish group, a year after the massacre, and nothing since. Is this because there were no Jewish women murdered that day? Are we also fed up with talking about violence against women? Are we Jews tired of all the "women's issues?"

Do we recognize our own intolerance when it's sanctified in the name of religion? Need I remind us all of the 16-year-old Muslim girl who was killed last month by her religious father for not wearing a head scarf, lest we think that the killing had nothing to do with religion and "women's issues?"

This Dec. 6 wasn't quiet for me, though – it was filled with "women's issues." I spent the day on the phone with a family that was searching for a rabbi to perform their child's bar mitzvah ceremony at a synagogue whose rabbi was unavailable that week. For various reasons, they needed someone right away and, not surprisingly, the vast majority of rabbis serving congregations were not available.

Finally a rabbi volunteered to help – a female rabbi, it just so happened. A series of embarrassed and apologetic phone calls followed from the various leaders of the synagogue involved, politely explaining the "problem" of having a woman rabbi. Then the family themselves called, exasperated and desperate. Couldn't I just help them find a male rabbi – right away – since they didn't want a woman rabbi? Since they didn't want her – based solely on her gender – couldn't I help them find someone of the "right" gender?

Never mind that in any other realm of Canadian life, such blatant job discrimination based on gender would be illegal. Never mind that not too long ago, Jews in general were also the object of such discrimination in the job market. Let's talk about violence to the soul.

I understand and accept that not all Jews are comfortable with or even recognize female rabbis. But do not ask me to facilitate a woman's delegitimization. It would be unthinkable spiritually, morally and politically to have apprehensions about black people in a certain job, or Asians in a certain school, or Latinos in a certain apartment building. But if you did, you would hopefully be respectful enough of them as people to think twice before sharing your issues about them to their face, or asking them to help you find someone more "suitable" than they are based solely on race.

It was ironic that this devaluing of a human being based on her gender happened on Dec. 6. In the Jewish community we will continue to disagree, I am sure, about the changes and accommodations we are prepared or not prepared to make because of modernity. But remember that there is more than one way to do harm to a woman with sexism that is so subtle and pervasive that we aren't even aware of it.

On this Dec. 6, I was reminded that "women's issues" are Jewish issues.

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Goldstein

Jewish Life

It's sad when the giving of a large charitable gift becomes the source of friction and lawsuits. In 1991, Sears Canada donated $10 million to Ryerson University and is currently initiating legal action in an attempt to force Ryerson to have the Sears name associated with an academic facility on its campus or to receive damages for breach of contract in return for the school's failure to do so.

While a plaque has been put up acknowledging the donation, Sears claims that its name was, according to its understanding of its agreement with the university, to appear on an academic building. Ryerson, not surprisingly, claims that all agreements were adhered to and that Sears agreed that the plaque would serve as due recognition for the donation.

What is interesting about this case is that it has taken 16 years for legal proceedings to begin. While Jewish law has no official statute of limitations, one must make a claim for monies owing at the first available opportunity. A delay is legally assumed to be an admission that the current situation is acceptable, and later claims to the contrary would then be dismissed.

Thus, for example, Jewish law rules that an employee's claims for unpaid wages must be made immediately when such payment was originally due. If it's proven, as Ryerson officials claim, that Sears officially attended the dedication of the building containing the Sears plaque and did not at the same time protest the company's alleged non-recognition, they would forfeit the right to any future demands of recognition.

There is little doubt that Jewish law insists that a donor's demand for recognition be honoured, and if the agreed upon recognition is not given, the donor has the right to request their money back. This is irrespective of the propriety of such an approach to charity, which should be given quietly and without fanfare. Such demands for recognition may, however, only be given at the time of the gift – a donor may not demand specific recognition for a previously donated gift.

It's well known that giving anonymously has always been the Jewish ideal and thus charity should be given with no strings attached. This is true both from the perspective of the recipients who can thus avoid feelings of dependence and embarrassment, and the donors who should cheerfully donate between 10 to 20 per cent of their net income with a sense of gratitude for their blessings and a desire to help others. The seeking of honour should not be part of the equation.

Unfortunately, the development of this crucial goal of modesty in all that we do at times conflicts with the greater needs of society. Jewish law fully understood that human nature is such that public recognition and honour can and usually does have a major impact on our decision-making process. Thus theory must give way to practical reality.

Jewish law thus not only permits but actually encourages (even obligates?) one to have their name displayed in recognition of gifts given. Such recognition will undoubtedly encourage additional giving both from the donor themselves and others, and thus it would be inappropriate to deny the community potential increased revenues. One's character development may have to be "sacrificed" for the general needs of the community.

Furthermore, while the donor should not, in theory, seek recognition, the recipient has an obligation to acknowledge such generosity. The need for proper acknowledgment, it could be argued, is even more acute when dealing with a corporate donor, to whom issues of personal humility are not germane. Whatever the ultimate resolution of this dispute, it highlights the sad, if necessary, fact that charity today is often no longer about helping those in need, but rather a slick form of marketing.

No one is going to try to convince you that your bubbe didn't teach you the best recipe for chicken soup, especially me. But if you are looking for a bit of help or for something a little different, there are plenty of suggestions from plenty of people's bubbes on the web.

Let's start off with some traditional recipes. Sure, Genevieve Goldshaw's chicken soup has racked up a prestigious award. But the real moment of truth came earlier when she tried to pass muster with the toughest judge around. "Finally, after eight years of practising and perfecting my soup, my grandmother admitted defeat. I can remember her facial features as if it was yesterday – she slowly put the spoonful in her mouth and as the spoon came out, a smile began to form on her face and I knew I was victorious." [<http://tinyurl.com/29ggdl>]

If you're not fortunate enough to have your own bubbe to share her secrets with you, don't fret. Bubbe Bayla is available. Her full name is Bayla Sher, and she and her grandson Avrom Hogen have put together a delightful series of videos that you watch free online – and glean her secrets. There are videos about borscht, blintzes, tzimmes and more. But the real star of the show is chicken soup, which merits three episodes. [tinyurl.com/2egucr] For more video variations, check out Lauren Groveman's kitchen and technique [tinyurl.com/2xorzu] as well as this one that throws in instructions for matzah balls. [<http://tinyurl.com/2krrlc>]

The Jewish-Food Chicken Soup Archives (isn't it great to know that such a place exists?) boasts about two dozen recipes including Harsha's Spicy, Farmhouse and Sickbed. [tinyurl.com/2bu6um] The Jerusalem Post has several recipes, including a "zingy" variation that doesn't spare the garlic (about 15 cloves.) [tinyurl.com/ywudjfl]

Meanwhile, University of Utah Hiller offers a vegetarian "chicken soup" recipe that doesn't call for any chickens at all. [tinyurl.com/you5ho]

Many people prepare a Shabbat cholent on Friday and let it cook overnight so that they can enjoy a warm meal on Saturday afternoon. For something different, why not try chicken soup on Shabbat afternoon? Cooks.com has several recipes for soups that you let stew for several hours. If you do plan to leave your soup in a slow cooker on Shabbat, you may want to experiment during the week to perfect how much water to use. [tinyurl.com/2s9f4j]

Next time you're in Israel and need a break from the country's wonderful and exotic restaurants, why not settle down to a bowl of you-know-what? Food critic Daniel Rogov has surveyed several Israeli restaurants in search of great soup. Tel Aviv's Batia Restaurant serves chicken soup "so full of fat and flavor that it will bring tears of nostalgic joy to your eyes." [tinyurl.com/yvbsxul]

"Why Don't More Jewish Men Cook?" That's the name of a blog "designed to teach Jewish men, especially from ones, that cooking and housework is not women's work; it's everyone's work." The site is sprinkled with recipes many of which begin with the word "easy" as in Easy Meatloaf and Easy Broccoli. The site's chicken soup recipe promises to be both delectable and not too difficult to make. [tinyurl.com/2y3zwdj]

No one has to convince Jerry Greenberg that Jewish men can cook. Greenberg was a finalist in the first national Chicken Soup Challenge. Four years ago, the National Jewish Outreach Program set out on a daring and daunting journey: to find the best chicken soup in America. Five hundred amateur cooks sent their recipes to Jeffrey Nathan, executive chef and owner of the acclaimed kosher restaurant Abigail's in New York. Nathan chose five finalists to compete at the four-hour cook-off. [tinyurl.com/ytbogk] The winner? Rosely Himmelstein with her somewhat traditional soup (carrot, onion, celery, leek, parsnip, sweet potato, rutabaga and dill). Finalist Jerry Greenberg (the only male in the final five) threw tradition to the wind with his Jamaican-Inspired Soup: yucca root, plantain, crimini and coconut milk.

Speaking of which, next time: chicken soup like Bubbe never used to make.

Israeli high school big band to perform in Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A 20-member Israeli high school big band is coming to Toronto later this month to participate in the International Association for Jazz Education (IAJE) conference and perform concerts throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

The band will be representing the Thelma Yellin High School for the Arts, the best school of the arts in Israel, located in Givatayim, a Tel Aviv suburb.

The school was founded 45 years ago in memory of Thelma Bentwich Yellin, an Israeli cellist whose dream it was to establish a high school for gifted music and arts students.

Students come from all over the country – from kibbutzim, moshavim, development towns and large cities – to study their chosen field of specialization, whether it's dance, classical music, jazz, drama, film or visual arts, and have to audition to be accepted into the school.

This year the big band was invited to participate in the annual IAJE Conference, from Jan. 9 to 12, for the second time in four years.

The IAJE is the biggest association of its kind and initiates programs that promote "the understanding and appreciation of jazz and its heritage."

Cong. House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel, an Orthodox shul in Calgary, Alberta, is searching for a pulpit rabbi. Please e-mail: herb.rosenberg@ucalgary.ca for details.

The Thelma Yellin High School for the Arts big band

The conference, which attracts about 7,000 jazz professionals each year, provides leadership and educational seminars and schedules performances by the participants.

Yossi Regev, the head of the jazz department at the school, who is accompanying the big band on the trip, said that it had to audition to be among the hundreds of jazz musicians who will perform at the conference.

For the past six years, there has been a group representing the Thelma Yellin school at the conference.

"I think we are among very few high schools that pass each year," Regev said.

He said that last year, the April Quintet represented the school, and in 2006, the Red Square, a six-member female a cappella group, performed.

This year, it will be the second time that the 20-member big band will perform at the conference since it did so in New York in 2004.

Regev said that although the students "are eager to perform," it is very costly for the students' parents who must foot all the travel costs in addition to paying tuition.

"The students and the parents have to pay for the whole thing. It's not in the school's budget, and we get nothing from the city and the state though we represent them," Regev said.

"But since we think it's important to show our music and bands all over, we are doing every effort to go abroad."

He said the school has to rely on donations and sponsors to help finance the trips.

The Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, headed by Cheryl

Weinstein, is one of the organizations that helped bring the big band to Toronto this year.

During their visit, they will perform throughout the city at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on Jan. 13, and at the Rex Jazz and Blues Bar the following day.

"They are also performing at Rosedale Heights School for the Arts. The kids there at the school and the kids who are coming [from Israel] are going to perform together. The music has been sent to Rosedale Heights and they will perform together for the students at the school," Weinstein said.

"The cross-cultural aspect of it is very interesting that they're performing at that school. They are acting as ambassadors for Israel."

For more information or for free tickets to the performance at the Miles Nadal JCC, call 416-924-6211, ext. 0.

MITZVAH KNITTERS:

The Shaar Shalom Mitzvah Knitters recently completed their 1,100th handcrafted item, which like all their other work was donated to someone in need. Since its inception in 2006, the group has grown to 60 active knitters and crocheters of all ages. Yarn is donated or purchased with funds raised by various projects and private donations. The group meets on alternate Monday evenings for a social, fun and productive evening. New contributors, as well as donations of yarn and cash, are always welcome. For more information, please contact Arna Cappe at 905-881-8631 or Janice Shachter at 905-731-0700.

Media focused on Mideast as a whole in 2007

If there was any trend that marked the media's coverage of the Middle East in 2007, it was what we may call the opening of the camera's lens onto the region as a whole in a way that was sustained as never before.

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

The result was that the near-obsessive focus on Israel in previous years – to the exclusion of arguably more significant or dramatic events elsewhere in the area – did not materialize in the mainstream media.

Leading the way for the Canadian media was Afghanistan, where Canada is deeply involved in both military and peace-building operations; and where several of our soldiers have tragically been killed or wounded. So it is entirely natural that the bulk of foreign affairs reports have come from that country.

For similar reasons, the U.S. media have been heavily focused on both Iraq and Afghanistan where the American military commitment is overwhelming and, frankly, overwhelming.

And because countries such as Iran, Pakistan and Syria are involved in one way or another – especially in being sources of insurgent forces going to Iraq and Afghanistan – the media have also been following developments there.

As well, each of the above-named countries has gone through internal developments that are newsworthy in themselves.

• Iran, led by radical Shiite theocrats, has been hard at work developing enriched uranium fuel, the essential ingredient in making atomic weapons.

• Iran's aggressive designs threaten not only Israel and the oil-rich and Sunni-dominant Arab Gulf states, they also threaten Sunni Arab states such as Egypt and Jordan.

• Syria's close ties to Iran, and its support of terrorist groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah, are perceived to destabilize Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority. Israel's reported bombing last September of a Korean-backed nuclear facility in northern Syria elicited virtual silence in the world. Contrast that with the enormous international condemnation that came crashing down on Israel following its 1981 bombing of the Osirak nuclear reactor in Iraq.

• Pakistan is home to several radical Islamic groups including Al-Qaeda, which is bent on overthrowing the current leadership and is frequently the instigator of horrific suicide bombings. Since Pakistan is reported to have about 30 nuclear bombs, there is considerable worry about what might happen should these fall into the hands of Islamic extremists.

• Turkey is facing its own insurgency brought about by the infiltration of Kurdish PKK radicals sneaking across the border from Iraq. How Turkey responds to that, combined with the re-election of an Islamic government in Ankara, could profoundly affect Turkey's relationship with both NATO and the European Union (to which it is seeking membership).

ing extensively on what is generally called the growing "Shia Crescent" and its conflict with Sunni Islam. One should add to that there are clashes within Sunni Islam itself as well as debates over the emerging conflict between Islamic and western values – especially in Europe.

In short, today, there are many world-historic forces at play that are preoccupying the media more than Israel.

The net effect has been that the old narrative about Israel as the regional Goliath has diminished, although it persists in certain journalistic circles. With the exception of dramatic events such as the war between Israel and Hezbollah in the summer of 2006, the media, by and large, are looking to other venues to feed their need for drama.

Even Israel's recent military operations against Hamas in Gaza, where within a period of two weeks about 20 Hamas and Islamic Jihad members were killed, received little attention.

To top it all off, more interest has been shown, for the first time, in internal Palestinian affairs – and in particular in the fissure between Fatah and Hamas, and its repercussions for Palestinian society.

To be sure, this brief survey is not meant to discount critical stories that the media do continue to report from Israel. Rather, it is meant to put those reports in a broader and changing context.

His father, Julius Rosenblatt, was a member of B'nai Brith Canada and from the time he was a child, Ronson says, he read all the B'nai Brith material that came to their house. He followed in his father's footsteps and joined B'nai Brith, District 22, Toronto Lodge in 1939.

He served as president of B'nai Brith Canada in 1979-1980 and held several executive positions with B'nai Brith International, including international vice-president from 1988 to 1992.

He served on the national commission of the Anti-Defamation League-League of Human Rights, and in 1994, during the celebration of B'nai Brith's 150th anniversary, he was selected as one of the 150 outstanding volunteers in B'nai Brith throughout the world.

"I was very proud of the many accomplishments of the league in the past and was proud to have been part of that important work," says Ronson.

Over the years, he spearheaded numerous causes including combating the anti-Semitic actions of Reverend A. C. Forrest, editor of the Observer, the official periodical of the United Church of Canada, in Forrest's crusade against the Jewish State.

In 1970, Ronson was one of three representatives of the Jewish community who negotiated an agreement with the Granite Club in Toronto when the Anti-Defamation League mounted an opposition campaign against the club's discrimination policy.

Ronson has received the league's rarely bestowed Special Human Rights award and inaugurated the Lou Ronson Human Rights Scholarship Fund, in conjunction with its annual Media Human Rights Award ceremony.

He also took leadership roles in other causes and organizations, including Mount Sinai Hospital, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, Canadian Jewish Congress, the Jewish Community Centre of Toronto, the Canada-Israel Committee, UNESCO and the Israel Chamber of Commerce.

Looking back on his life in a recent interview, he spoke of his children, Jeremy, a professional musician, Rhonda, an entrepreneur, and his devoted wife, Hilda, who recently passed away "after 60 wonderful years of marriage."

"My life has been very rewarding. There were many challenges and we would meet them. It's helped me to grow and to contribute to the building of a society where there will be no discrimination."

"There have been great improvements," he added, "but we still have a ways to go."

Objections to stem cell research are cultural, ethical: expert

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

While stem cell research has the potential to change the face of medicine, it also raises a number of ethical, halachic, legal and cultural questions, said Dr. Avraham Steinberg.

Steinberg, an ordained rabbi, is a pediatric neurologist and an international expert in Jewish biomedical ethics. He is director of the centre for medical ethics at the Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical School and director of the medical ethics unit at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre, both in Jerusalem. He is the 1999 winner of the Israel Prize.

His recent lecture on stem cells was part of a scholar-in-residence program at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Stem cells are immature, undifferentiated cells that can develop into any cell found in the human body. However, once cells mature, they lose that ability, Steinberg said.

Stem cells currently used for research come from two sources – unused or rejected eggs from in vitro fertilization procedures or from a miscarried or aborted fetus, he said. Occasionally, he added, they may come from amniotic fluid or umbilical-cord blood.

Stem cells from bone marrow have been used for some time, and it is hoped that they will also be useful in treating Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer's disease, stroke and diabetes.

If the potential for good is so high, why, then, is there so much controversy?

Steinberg said that the ethical and legal objections to stem cell research mainly boil down to the question of when life begins and the question of what is life.

"It is not a scientific matter. It is cultural, ethical and social. If society says that life begins at five, then that's when it begins," he stressed.

Life may be considered to begin at different stages of development – conception, implantation, 14 days, 40 days (the Jewish concept), the first fetal movement, when the fetus becomes viable, or the moment of birth.

Is using a fetal cell acceptable when it is for important, life-saving purposes? When it would be thrown out anyway? Most significant are the questions of whether destroying a stem cell is murder; whether it is acceptable to destroy a cell for a greater good; and whether using these stem cells encourages abortion, Steinberg said. All these questions concern both the general population and the scientific community, he added.

Politics, Steinberg said, has entered the equation, too. Germany, Norway, Argentina, Poland and some U.S. states prohibit any use at all. In the United States, only stem cell lines (families of cells derived from a single, original stem cell) created before 9 p.m. on Aug. 9, 2001, are acceptable, and research on them receives federal funding. The problem is that after so long, many of these lines are defective and useless, Steinberg said.

This is not merely a theoretical problem, he said, as research into stem cells requires an enormous amount of money – too much to come from private or even corporate sources.

Religious opinions also differ on stem cell research, he said. Catholicism "absolutely prohibits it, just as it does contraception and abortion." Protestant denominations are divided: Islam permits it.

In Jewish thought, there is the philosophy that the enhancement of knowledge enhances our belief in the Almighty, Steinberg said. "The more we know, the more we know the incredible thing God did [in creating the world]."

We are partners with God in healing the world. God left the world unfinished, for man to complete, Steinberg said. Those who are able to do something concrete, then, such as doctors and scientists, are not only allowed, but obligated, to do what they can, he noted.

On the other hand, research must not involve an inherent halachic prohibition; it must not lead to a prohibited result, and the benefit must surpass any detriment, he stressed.

Judaism recognizes that there is a difference between an embryo that is still in a test tube (such as for in vitro fertilization) and one that has been implanted into a woman's womb. Inherent human rights are acquired in a progressive way, depending on developmental status.

"Each stage, however, has its own holiness," Steinberg said.

Before implantation, a fertilized egg [in Halachah] has no human status. However, it is respected as a part of humanity and as potential life.

While Halachah allows fertilized eggs to be used for in vitro fertilization, creating fertilized eggs for research is not.

In cases of potential genetic problems, such as the presence of the gene for Tay-Sachs disease, testing fertilized eggs for the mutated gene and then implanting only the healthy ones, while disposing of the ill ones, is now done routinely, Steinberg said.

For instance, a carrier of the gene for neurofibromatosis (a set of genetic disorders that cause tumours to grow along various types of nerves and can affect non-nevous system tissues) was afraid to have children and so underwent the procedure.

Haredi Torah scholar Rabbi Yoseph Shalom Eliashiv said that in principle such a procedure is permissible, but only on a case by case basis, Steinberg said.

The procedure is done for serious reasons, "not, for example, because you want a blue-eyed child," he added.

Last month, researchers announced that they had succeeded in turning skin cells into stem cells. A team led by Dr. Shinya Yamanaka of Kyoto University and another led by Junying Yu, who was working with stem cell researcher James Thomson of the University of Wisconsin, managed to use skin cells to create stem cells. If successful, this would avoid many ethical and halachic issues.

While the breakthrough has been hailed by scientists and media all over the world, it is important to note that the technology is not close to being used therapeutically. It is also not known if stem cells made this way will themselves be prone to cause disease.

Over 5,000 pebbles collected for project

"The question 'what is six million?' has often come up with the kids here. After watching the film, we were trying to think of a way to demonstrate that as well," she said.

"We actually thought of the pebbles, and one of the reasons is that it is also a sign of respect to place a pebble on the tombstone of someone who has passed away. We have several students in the school who are Jewish and there are two girls whose grandmother just passed away and they had been talking about putting the stones on her grave, and that is where the idea came from."

Having just started collecting pebbles in September, the staff and students at the Goodwin Learning Centre are still trying to figure out how to display the pebbles.

"We don't have an idea of what the six million are going to look like yet either so at this point... so we've got them neatly in a bin."

Michael said that initially they thought to build a memorial path as an extension of the school's peace garden, but the pebbles each come with a story and have meaning to the students, so they are still contemplating the best way to exhibit them.

"A lot of kids are coming in with stories as well, so we're [marking them and] keeping a journal just to remember everything. They're really taking it to heart... It's not just a project about collecting rocks. It takes on a much bigger meaning for them as well," she said.

"At this point, we have 5,447 rocks. We are trying to get a rock from every single province and territory in Canada, and from as many different countries in the world. For example, I went overseas in the summer. I travelled to England, Italy and France, so I brought pebbles back with me from there," she said, adding that students also bring back pebbles from countries they've travelled to.

Since the staff began sending out letters to spread word about their campaign and ask people to help them reach their goal, pebbles have been coming in from local members of Parliament, famous authors and Holocaust survivors.

"We got a pebble from [children's author] Robert Munsch, so that was a real highlight. John Koning is another author who is a very good friend of our school, and he sent in a pebble and included some stories."

Marion Blumenthal, a Holocaust survivor and the author of Four Perfect Pebbles, also informed the staff via e-mail that a pebble was on the way, Michael said.

"We sent a letter to Elie Wiesel as well. We haven't heard back from him, but after we read Night, the children all sent him what they thought were their best responses from our novel study we had done and he sent us an autographed copy of his book, so we're sure that as soon as he receives our letter, he'll send a pebble as well."

Michael said she is excited about the project and isn't discouraged by the fact that 5,447 pebbles is a long way from six million.

"It's going to take a while, but that's OK and we're going to stick with it. It is such an important part of the school and what we do anyway every year. I don't foresee that it will lose steam."

Day school aids Hamilton's homeless

By HOLLY GINSLER

Special to The C.J.N.

HAMILTON — Kehila Jewish Community Day School collected 36 blankets and sleeping bags for Hamilton's homeless.

Kehila's students, from junior kindergarten to Grade 5, began collecting the sleeping bags and blankets in late September 2007, from members of Hamilton's Jewish community.

Representatives from the McMaster Student Outreach Collective (MacSOC) picked up the donations on Dec. 20.

It's a mitzvah project that fits beautifully with our tikkun olam mission, to save the world one person at a time, says Leia Ger-Rogers, Kehila Day School's principal.

Hamilton's Homeless Project, to which the items have been donated, is run by McMaster Student Outreach Collective (MacSOC), a group of volunteers that includes McMaster University staff, faculty and students. The organization's mandate is to work with the community in the delivery of services to those who are marginally housed, homeless or at risk of homelessness in Hamilton. MacSOC was founded in 1999 by two McMaster nursing students.

MacSOC's volunteers go out on Wednesday nights to provide the homeless with food, clothing, blankets and health information, as well as assistance in connecting to medical services.

MacSOC's volunteers Alyshaah Kaba, Medinat Giwa, Dan Lawlor and Ray Lawlor met with Kehila students when they picked up the donations.

Lawlor told the students that there were some people in the city who were cold and living on the street and who weren't able to afford to live nicely. There were gasps of surprise when the students heard that children their age and homeless elderly people needed these gifts to keep warm.

People in need can pick up the blankets and sleeping bags at a drop-in centre in a downtown church operated by the Hamilton's Homeless Project.

"You should be very proud of yourselves," said Kaba as she handed a plaque to Kehila student Ethan Feldman, honouring the school and thanking it for supporting MacSOC.

Ger-Rogers learned about MacSOC in 2002, when she wanted the students at her previous school to get involved in community work. Many programs, such as ones at hospitals and soup kitchens, don't accept volunteers under 15.

She says that Kehila will also donate winter coats to the homeless.

Quoting anthropologist Margaret Mead, Ger-Rogers says her motto is, "Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful, committed citizens can change the world."

Montreal UTT school to stay open

BY JANICE ARNOLD

Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Faced with strong opposition from parents and the St. Laurent Jewish community, the administration of the United Talmud Torahs (UTT) branch in that borough has decided the school won't close next year after all, and probably not for at least three years.

On Dec. 17, the school's executive and board of directors reversed a resolution passed in November to close the Beutel UTT because of increasing financial problems and a declining enrolment, and merge it with the other UTT campus in Snowdon.

The administration has now decided to give a parent group's plan a chance to save the school.

The parents, who said they were surprised at the decision to close and had not been consulted on how to help the school survive, voted 90 per cent against closure. They quickly rallied, with rabbis and other community leaders in the area, as well as alumni, to raise about $160,000 and launch a campaign to encourage more parents to send their children to the school.

Many in the Jewish community at large especially wanted to see the school stay open because it had made a determined effort to rebuild after a hate-motivated firebombing in 2004.

The parent group submitted a proposal on how to gradually increase enrolment and restore the school to financial health over the coming years.

The decision to stay open for now has the support of FEDERATION CJA, which, over the past year, has been working with UTT to try to get the system on a more solid footing, president Marc Gold said.

He said the federation will honour the commitment it made when the school was expected to close, to grant an additional $800,000 to the UTT system over the next four years, with a large portion being allocated immediately to help cover its operating costs.

This amount is above the $1.3 million already earmarked over the same period to subsidize students who don't pay full tuition.

The UTT system, which also includes the Herzliya High Schools on the Beutel and Snowdon campuses, is running a deficit of more than $650,000, Gold said.

The recommendation to close the Beutel UTT was made by a task force set up by the federation and its agency the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre that included the UTT administration and outside experts. It thought demographic trends indicate that there are not enough elementary-age children to keep both UTTs open.

Parents other than those who may be part of the administration were not involved in this process, but have since been invited onto a reactivated task force that will guide UTT through the transition period, Gold said.

The plan sets specific targets and deadlines for fundraising and boosting enrolment, which Gold is confident are achievable with enough effort on the part of the school leadership and parent body. The federation has also promised to become a "partner" with the school to "steward" its direction.

The Beutel UTT, which opened in 1962, has 125 students, which is half its capacity, and which is French, has about the same number, which represents 65 per cent of capacity.

The loss of UTT in St. Laurent was seen as a major blow to its Jewish community, whose numbers have been going down.

Foreign Affairs to monitor aid to Palestinians

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canadian financial support for the Middle East peace process should be followed by careful monitoring.

So said the Canada-Israel Committee – the official representative of the organized Canadian Jewish community on matters pertaining to Canada-Israel relations – following Canada's December pledge of $300 million in aid to the Palestine Authority over the next five years, as part of a world effort to help continue the renewed Middle East peace process begun in Annapolis last November.

Maxime Bernier

A total of $7.4 billion worth of aid to the Palestinians was promised by some 90 foreign delegates at the Dec. 17 Paris donors' conference, convened for funding talks with PA President Mahmoud Abbas.

Immediately after Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier pledged Canadian aid at the conference, the CIC urged the government to exercise due diligence before handing over the money.

The committee said it held out "guarded optimism" for a renewed peace with the caveat that Canada ensure its funds don't fall into the wrong hands.

"The announcement... speaks to Canada's enhanced role in the Israel-Palestinian peace process over the past two years. With our increased role... comes the added responsibility of ensuring that Canadian assistance benefits from careful monitoring and measures to ensure accountability and transparency," said Moshe Ronen, national chair of the CIC in a press release.

CRTC raps radio host

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Radio-Canada radio host's comments about a Sabbath-observing Jewish hockey player did not meet the Broadcasting Act's "high standard requirement," but they weren't abusive under the regulations of the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC), the regulatory body has ruled.

The CRTC was referring to some of Joël Le Bigot's remarks on the talk shows Pourquoi pas dimanche and Samedi et rien d'autre about the religious identity and practices of then-Quebec Remparts player Benjamin Rubin, which the host made on at least five occasions in September and October 2006.

While the comments were intended to be humorous, the CRTC concluded they were "gratuitous and repetitive, and that the manner in which the radio host chose to comment on the topic, including his choice of words, was inappropriate and uncalled for."

However, it continues, the comments, "when taken in context, did not expose the Jewish community to hatred or contempt" or ridicule the player.

Radio-Canada is the CBC's French-language network.

Correction

"True peace between Israelis and the Palestinians can only be achieved on the basis of an economically viable and democratic Palestinian Authority. To that end, the PA must undertake real democratic and institutional reforms, such as building an independent judiciary, developing business and industry, and creating the infrastructure for a successful civil society. The CIC welcomes Canada's increased role in assisting to bring about this reality."

At the Paris conference, Bernier noted that Canada's funding would go towards "institution-building in the Palestinian Authority and [helping to] build a better public service for all Palestinians. We will also work with Canadian and local non-governmental organizations, other actors and the Palestinian Authority to promote tolerance and combat hatred and the incitement of violence," he said. "And to improve prosper-perity, we will help to stimulate the Palestinian economy through its private sector."

Bernier added that Canada's aid would not be unconditional.

"We will need to see demonstrable progress in negotiations by both sides, as well as progress in Palestinian democratic reforms," he said.

When contacted about what mechanisms Canada will use to hold the PA responsible for proper distribution of the funds, Neil Hrab, director of communications for the Department of Foreign Affairs told The CJN that all funding would correspond to Canadian anti-terrorism legislation.

"Canada will ensure that Canadian funds do not directly or indirectly benefit Hamas or other terrorist groups listed under Canadian law," Hrab said.

Community welcomes Supreme Court get decision

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbis, Jewish community organizations and advocates for agunah rights are hailing the landmark Dec. 14 Supreme Court of Canada decision upholding damages to a Jewish woman whose ex-husband withheld a get for 15 years, despite having agreed in writing to immediately issue it once they were civilly divorced.

In a 7-2 decision, the high court said the agreement, despite its religious nature, was part of a contract and therefore within the domain of the courts. It overturned a 2005 Quebec Court of Appeal ruling that secular courts cannot intervene because of that religious nature and that the agreement to provide the Jewish religious divorce was, at most, "a moral obligation."

Alan Stein, lawyer for the victorious Stephanie Bruker, said the judgment has a profound significance for the Canadian Jewish community because it establishes that commitments to give a get — whether in a prenuptial agreement or, as in this case, as a corollary measure in the context of divorce proceedings — are enforceable civilly.

Although it was not a subject of argument, Stein believes that the constitutionality of Section 21.1 of the Divorce Act, which requires that divorcing spouses remove barriers to their exes' religious remarriage, cannot be challenged from here on in. The 1990 amendment was made mainly at the urging of the Jewish community as a way to prevent women from becoming agunot — that is, unable to marry again or have legitimate children within traditional Judaism.

The case was represented before the Supreme Court pro bono by William Brock, David Stelow and Brandon Wiener of Davies Ward Phillips & Vineberg of Montreal, along with Stein, who acted for Bruker in the lower courts. The Canadian Civil Liberties Association was an intervenor.

In a statement, the firm says the judgment holds that the 1980 agreement between Bruker, now 59 and living in New York, and Jessel (Jason) Marcovitz, 75, of Montreal, to go before the rabbinical authorities "immediately" upon the granting of the decree nisi, or provisional divorce, was "a valid and binding contractual obligation under Quebec law and that such an agreement is consistent with public policy, the Canadian approach to marriage and divorce and the commitment to eradicating gender discrimination."

Marcovitz's lawyer had argued that it was not valid under the province's Civil Code — unique in Canada — and that the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms protected him from having to pay damages for his failure to fulfil a promise to perform a religious rite.

He had also tried to prove that he didn't need to give Bruker a get because she was not living an Orthodox Jewish life.

"The majority further held that there was no infringement of [Marcovitz's] freedom of religion, since his refusal to provide a get was 'based less on religious conviction than on the fact that he was angry with [Bruker].'" the Davies statement continued.

Justice Rosalie Abella wrote: "The public interest in protecting equality rights, the dignity of Jewish women in their independent ability to remarry, as well as the public benefit in enforcing valid and binding contractual obligations, are among the interests and the values that outweigh [Marcovitz's] claim that enforcing [the get agreement] would interfere with his religious freedom."

Abella cites the Divorce Act's Section 21.1 in her judgment.

She notes that while the parties agreed not to dispute its constitutionality, they did not agree that it could not be used in analyzing the other issues in this case.

The Supreme Court sided with Quebec Superior Court judge Israel Mass' 2003 decision, made following a trial that lasted more than 30 days, to award Bruker $47,500, plus interest and indemnity — well below the $1.35 million she sought. The Supreme Court, however, did not go along with her bid to have that amount increased to $400,000. She first launched civil proceedings in 1989.

Rabbi Michael Whitman, president of the Montreal Board of Rabbis, said the decision is "a very strong statement in protecting women and against claiming religious freedom in order to hurt other people... This is an appropriate limit on religious freedom. And, from a Jewish point of view, there is no such thing as the right to withhold a get. The obligation is to give a get and to receive a get. Anything else is just a sin."

He emphasized that the court's ordering a man to pay damages for not delivering a promised get does not constitute coercion, from a Jewish perspective. "The sources clearly assert that if a man agrees [to give the get] of his own free will, it is not considered coercion," he said.

He believes it is essential that couples now draw up prenuptial agreements that include an agreement to go through the get process, should the marriage dissolve, something he has insisted upon for more than 25 years. "I would be happy to share with any rabbi in Canada the text that I use which has been reviewed by legal counsel."

Evelyn Brook, president of the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, who has followed this case closely through the years, called the decision "a relief. Agunot now know they have civil remedy."

"It's a clear statement that men cannot abuse the unilateral power they have," she said, adding that she hopes more women will now come forward to seek redress.

Canadian Jewish Congress co-president Rabbi Reuben Bulka said: "This decision establishes that the religious overtones of a contract will not prevent the courts from enforcing it, provided it corresponds to Canada's public policy and is in keeping with the charters [the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms]."

"In this particular case, the judgment will serve to help level the playing field for Jewish women filing for divorce and will serve notice that those standing in the way of people moving forward with their lives will not do so with impunity."

"We welcome this verdict and will follow closely its application in subsequent cases."

Benaim hopes for seniors' home

"All the parents came to this country ignorant of the country — where the country was located, the weather, the language — completely ignorant. I could not believe it. But the majority have been successful. Most Moroccans that came to Canada, they came without money," Benaim said, adding that it is important to acknowledge the help they received from JIAS.

"We have come a long way. We have doctors in the community, we have investors. I would say a majority of the people have achieved what they wanted to achieve. Moroccans are getters," he said.

But the Moroccan community isn't just celebrating where they are today, but also where they came from.

Last month, hundreds gathered at the Sephardic Kehila Centre for an event called A Night in Morocco.

The event featured a screening of a documentary called Jewish Morocco, by Meyer Ifrah. Ifrah recently travelled to Morocco to conduct interviews with locals, visit the Jewish ghettos where thousands of Jews used to live and film centuries-old synagogues and cemeteries in which renowned tzaddikim are buried.

Following the screening, Mohamed Tanji, the Moroccan ambassador to Canada, spoke to the audience about the positive impact that the Jewish communities had on the country.

Moroccan Jews contributed to the religious, cultural, political and economic development of Morocco, and the religious leaders of the Jewish community had the respect, not only of their own followers, but also the Muslim community, Tanji said. But Benaim, who has been a dedicated community volunteer for decades, is always looking ahead and is currently working on another ambitious project.

"My goal now... is to build a senior citizens' home for Sephardim, because of the language barrier. There will be a retirement home for these old folks who vegetate eight or nine months out of the year in their apartment alone, with nobody to talk to," he said.

"If we had a senior citizen retirement home, they would be housed there, they would be able to speak to their neighbour who speaks Spanish or French, and have certain activities for them."

Benazar is also looking to the future and said he is optimistic because some of the youth are even more exposed to and involved with Judaism than their parents were at their age.

"I'll give you an example: years ago, when we came to a small Moroccan synagogue on Sukkot, we probably had one lulav for the whole synagogue and today, every congregant is carrying a lulav with his children... We built synagogues, and there are more people attached to religion today than there was before."

Coast to Coast

KUGEL COOKERS: Bulbes (potatoes) were a staple food of the shtetl, and the title of a well-loved Yiddish song. Grade 7 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School put their translation skills to work recently as they collaborated to make bulbes kugel from an original recipe in Yiddish. Delicious smells wafted through the halls as students enjoyed the fruits of their labour. Pictured hard at work are, from left, Matthew Turk, Noah Gropper, Ryan Nisker, Aliya Szpindel and Rachel Grossman.

DONATION NATION: Grade 6 students at Leo Baack Day School's southern campus pose with representatives of the three highest placing classes in the school's Donation Nation collection for the North York Harvest Food Bank. The graph behind them shows that the winning class reached almost 500 per cent of its goal, pushing the school to more than double its initial target for food collection. Pictured, back row from left, are Gabe Nisker, Spencer Robins, Jordan Pike, Ellie Godfrey and Nate Daviau; and, front row from left, Samantha Posen, Jordan Posen, Samantha Richmond and Chelsea Rozansky.

New Jewish studies program on its way

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A husband and wife team, both Harvard University scholars, are hoping that a new adult education Jewish studies program in the Greater Toronto Area will help build bridges between the academy and the Jewish community.

Hindy Najman, a professor of ancient Judaism at the University of Toronto, is the co-dean of the Maimonides Schools for Jewish Learning in the GTA and Hamilton, along with her husband, Paul Franks, also a U of T professor in the Jewish studies program.

Inspired by the success of similar programs in other North American cities, including Boston and Chicago, Najman and Franks thought that the Toronto Jewish community would benefit from a new Jewish studies program.

"The program really focuses on the whole history of Judaism, from Jewish thought to Jewish history to Jewish interpretation, and it is intended to raise the bar of Jewish education throughout the city," Najman said.

The school is hoping to cater to professionals and teachers who are seeking a master's degree that may be useful in Jewish education or communal service, as well as those who simply want to enrol in courses to deepen their Jewish knowledge.

To obtain a master's degree a student must complete 10 courses that consist of 10 weekly sessions. To be accepted into the program, a student must have a bachelor's degree that a school like York University or U of T would recognize, and two letters of recommendation from teachers, rabbis, employers, or colleagues.

"There is a lot of desire and interest. We want teachers to have an opportunity to keep learning and that is exactly what happens at Hebrew College in Boston. It is filled with high school teachers and it's filled with lay people. Many of the teachers are from Brandeis [University], or from Harvard or from Boston University, which is great," Najman said.

"We've had a lot of inquiries from people who just want to get a master's, not because they want to teach, and not because they want to go on to do doctoral work... but because they're goal-oriented. This is Toronto — they are high-powered, they're really interested, they're very intelligent, they're well educated and they'd like to acquire a master's."

The school, which is established and chartered as an institute of higher learning in Ontario, has attracted faculty from some of the best institutions in Canada, including Harry Fox and Robert Gibbs from U of T, Sam Ajzenstat and Alan Mendelson from McMaster University, and Isaac Hollander from York.

"There are courses in Jewish thought, ancient Judaism, in modern Hebrew prose, in medieval polemics, the conversation between Christianity and Judaism and Islam, as well as courses... on the development of Jewish thought and interpretation," Najman said.

"The idea is to have as broad of a stretch both methodologically and textually, depending on people's interests and background."

Najman added that this brand of Jewish education won't be tied to any denomination or particular community.

"This is not Torah in Motion, and this is not Mekorot (the Institute of Torah Study for Women)... Those are excellent programs for the community, [but] we're not in competition with them," she said.

"It is not focused on the Orthodox community, it is not focused on the Conservative community. The faculty is deliberately variegated. They are from different parts of the Jewish community, so we are open to have students of all different levels and all different interests and to help locate them in the program."

Najman said the administrators plan to poll students about what interests them so they can mould the program into what the students want.

"We're going to offer a wide variety of courses. There isn't going to be repetition, unless there is a demand for it."

She added that she hopes the professors will teach the same course on several levels — introductory, intermediate and advanced — depending on the students' expectations.

"What we want to do right now is figure out what the needs are of the Toronto Jewish community. That is our goal. And to try to address those needs and co-ordinate the demand with our product, what we're able to give students," she said.

Najman expects that most of her clientele will be Hebrew day school parents, so as their children grow in a Jewish learning environment, so will they.

"It's a way of enhancing family life, not just personal development. The entire family unit will grow through these courses," she said.

"This is about a relationship with the community... What we'd like to see is a growing relationship between the academy and the community... It's about a regular and natural relationship with the university."

Classes begin Jan. 21 and will be held at four different locations: The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, the B'nai Brith Building on Hove Street, the Yeshiva of Hamilton, and Associated Hebrew School on Atkinson Avenue.

For a master's degree, each course will cost $375. For non-degree students, each course costs $175.

The registrar of the school, Norman Smith, will be accepting applications until mid-January.

For more information visit www.maimonidesschools.ca or contact Smith at registrar@maimonidesschools.ca.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Brunch made easy

By NORENE GILLETZ

In January, when the days are cold, dark and dreary, why not invite guests to join you for brunch? Sharing food with friends and family around the table is always a wonderful way to warm the heart. And if you are lucky enough to be a snowbird in a warm, sunny location, these simple, delicious dishes will also please those lucky enough to be seated at your table.

Most brunch dishes are loaded with fat and calories – but not the ones below. Here are two favourites that are sure to bring rave reviews. Best of all, they can be made in advance with ingredients you can buy at the local supermarket – little work, no guilt! To your health!

CRUSTLESS SPINACH & MUSHROOM QUICHE

Source: Healthy Helpings (originally published as Meal, Leani Yumm!)

The processor makes quick work of this healthy, flavour-packed quiche!

10 oz. (300 g) package frozen spinach
1 large onion
1/2 cup red pepper
2 tsp. canola oil
1 lb. (250 g) mushrooms
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 slices whole-wheat bread
1 egg plus 2 egg whites
1/4 cup skim milk
1/2 cup grated low-fat Swiss or cheddar cheese
1 cup low-fat ricotta or cottage cheese
2 tbsp. grated Parmesan cheese
salt and pepper, to taste
1 tbsp. minced fresh dill

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 10-inch ceramic quiche dish with nonstick spray (or spray miniature muffin tins very well). Pierce package of spinach with a sharp knife in several places. Place on a microsafe plate and microwave on HIGH for 3 to 4 minutes, until defrosted. When cool, remove from package and squeeze dry.

In the processor, chop onion and red pepper with quick on/off. In a large nonstick skillet, heat oil on medium-high. Sauté onion and pepper until soft, about 5 minutes. Chop mushrooms with quick on/off. Add to skillet along with garlic. Sauté 5 minutes longer. Remove from heat; cool slightly.

Process bread to make soft crumbs. Add spinach and process until fine. Add egg, egg whites, milk and cheeses; mix well. Add sautéed vegetables and mix with quick on/off. Add seasonings and dill. Spoon mixture into prepared pan(s) and bake at 350 F until golden. Bake minis 18 to 20 minutes or a large quiche for 40 to 45 minutes. Yield: 10 wedges or 3 dozen miniatures. Reheats and/or freezes well.

Garden Vegetable Quiche: Omit spinach and mushrooms. Substitute a 10-oz. (300 g) package frozen mixed vegetables (broccoli, cauliflower, carrots). Cook frozen vegetables as per package directions. Add to quiche mixture along with sautéed vegetables.

For a Crowd: Double the recipe and bake in a sprayed 10 x 15-inch jelly roll pan. (Sometimes I sprinkle the bottom of the pan lightly with seasoned bread crumbs before adding quiche mixture.) Cut in large squares as a main dish or small squares as hors d'oeuvres.

CRAZY BLINTZ SOUFFLE

Source: The Food Processor Bible

Linda Warner of Farmington Hills, Mich., sent me her recipe for this brunch dish. You can prepare the batter and filling a day in advance and assemble it just before baking. The original recipe called for 1 cup of butter. My version has a fraction of the fat! Serve this with sour cream or yogurt and top with sliced almonds or jam.

Batter:

1 cup flour
1 tbsp. baking powder
dash salt
1/2 cup margarine or butter, melted and cooled
1/2 cup sugar
2 eggs (or 1/2 cup egg substitute)
1/2 cup milk (skim or 1%)
1 tsp. vanilla or 1/2 tsp. almond extract

Filling:

3 cups (1 1/2 lb.) ricotta cheese (low-fat is fine)
2 cups (1 lb./500 g) light cream cheese
2 eggs (or 1/2 cup egg substitute)
1/4 cup sugar
juice of a large lemon (3 1/2 tbsp.)
1 tsp. each grated lemon and orange peel
dash salt

Spray a 9 x 13-inch glass baking dish with nonstick spray. (You can also use two 9-inch pie plates.) Use the Steel Blade to process all ingredients.

For batter: Combine all ingredients and blend until smooth, about 30 seconds, scraping down sides of bowl once or twice. Transfer batter to a 4 cup measuring cup or bowl. (Don't bother washing processor bowl. Just scrape it out well with a spatula.)

For filling: Process ricotta cheese and cream cheese until smooth, about 30 seconds. Add remaining filling ingredients and process 30 seconds longer.

Assembly: Pour half the batter into prepared dish. Spoon filling over, gently spreading without mixing it into the batter. Pour remaining batter over filling.

Bake in preheated oven at 300 about 1 1/2 hours, until set and nicely browned. (If baked in two pie plates, baking time is about 1 1/2 hours.) Yield: 12 servings. Reheats and/or freezes well.

Note: Cottage cheese can be used instead of ricotta cheese. I've also made this using 4 cups ricotta cheese and 1 cup cottage cheese, with excellent results.

HEEBONICS

From hippie roots to standup hoots

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Mo Mandel was born to scared, hippie parents who fled New York to settle in the backwoods of Boonville, Calif.

They'd heard that if a nuclear bombardment occurred in the United States, something about Boonville's geographic location would miraculously shield its residents from any radioactive fallout.

With a quirky life setup like that, it's no wonder the man became a standup comedian.

Speaking to CJN/Heebonics from California late last year, Mandel, 26, - who is rapidly making a name for himself in comedic circles on the West Coast - was game to discuss anything and everything, from his drugged-out parents to his desire to someday come to Canada and perform "in the Canadian super... bowl, dome, thing. Whatever you've got going on up there."

OK, so he's not too up on Canadian landmarks.

Still, the winner of the 2007 Open Mic Fight - ComedyCentral's yearly amateur standup contest, decided upon via Internet fan voting - is rapidly increasing the scope of his travels after his big win.

After winning the Open Mic Fight last October, Mandel was picked up by the Gersh Agency, a powerhouse talent agency representing many comic superstars, including Dave Chappelle, Drew Carey and Andy Samberg.

"[Standup comedy] is all about getting your name around. It's a pretty small world, so once everyone starts talking... all it takes is one person to mention you to one club owner and [your reputation] spreads like wildfire," Mandel said.

Surprisingly, he credits his contest win to the influence of the people behind the birthright Israel experience - which he participated in last summer - who sent out mass e-mail alerts, urging birthrighters to vote for him online.

"They're an awesome organization. They shot out e-mail to 180,000 people... basically the entire alumni of birthright, telling them to vote," he said, adding that he's sure someone at the organization regrets the decision because some of his humour pokes fun at Jewish stereotypes.

"I do a joke about Jewish women being unattractive. I bet they didn't see that," he said with a laugh.

For most comedians, himself included, the journey from obscurity to fame is a hard one, Mandel admitted.

"I don't know if I wanna be that guy who's always on the road. I may want a more normal life," Mandel said.

When it's mentioned to him that a standup career and "normal life" may not be compatible goals, Mandel agreed.

"Yeah, I'm starting to see that now. My girlfriend is always telling me how she never gets to see me in the daylight hours. She works [all day], and then I come home at 1 a.m. It's hard," he said.

But he's far from throwing in the towel. Instead, Mandel hopes to secure more acting, writing and comedy gigs after making the move to Los Angeles.

Mandel's always loved writing - his website states he pursued a degree in creative writing at the University of California at Santa Barbara "while taking extra curricular courses in social rejection" - but to hear Mandel tell it, he knew early on it wasn't the career for him.

"I was always interested in writing a novel, which I did," he said. "But the problem is that no one reads it. So I said, 'I wanna get some more feedback and feel it.' The thing about standup is that you can write something on the way to the club and share it with people right away."

And with his Jewish, albeit unconventional, family and personal history, it took him no time to translate life into art.

"I was exposed to guys like Jackie Mason and Woody Allen from an early age... which probably wouldn't have happened if I was Puerto Rican," he quipped.

"And I was a really small kid growing up. I was like, 103 pounds in high school. Our family was only one of four Jewish ones in our town. So a lot of times we were at the mercy of the redneck kids [and] the Mexican kids... and I had these Jewish intellectual parents from New York who had moved out into the middle of nowhere, because they wanted their kid to grow up oppressed."

Along the way, Mandel said he experienced Jewish rites of passage and traditions unlike those of other Jews.

"My bar mitzvah was in the woods in a eucalyptus grove, which was very cool," he recalled. "My parents set up some chairs and my mom invited a native American shaman friend of hers. He was there playing drums and singing songs. So it definitely wasn't your classic East Coast bar mitzvah by any stretch."

Even his first name was arrived at by divine, hippie providence, he said.

Comedian Mo Mandel promotes his Open Mic Fight performance last October

"My real name is Mohahn. My dad went to a used bookstore... and was looking up names in a New Age baby-name book," Mandel said. "He didn't feel it was necessary to buy the book. He just sat in the store, writing down names."

"He was [being] rushed, so he wrote down the name 'Mohahn,' which he thought was in the Hebrew section. It wasn't until my bris that the rabbi pointed out that it wasn't a Hebrew name at all. Turns out it's a Hindu name."

Dad had been to the Hindu section. But my parents were like, 'Screw it. It's too late.' So I have a Hindu first name."

It's perhaps partly for these reasons that Mandel's standup comedy act is rife with undertones of anger and frustration. "Yeah, I like to push the envelope," he said.

"The whole fun is challenging the audience... daring you to hate me while at the same time keeping you on my side, kinda thing. To me, it's not really worth it unless [the joke] is in your face and it's a boxing match with the audience."

Mandel, who has already shared stage time with Craig Ferguson, Dana Carvey and Dave Attell, among others, is scheduled to continue touring across America in 2008 and to perform in another Comedy Central special this March.

"I've been lucky that people have thought I was funny enough to put me on their shows. But comedy is a funny thing. A lot of the time it comes down to one guy [who will book you] for a show. It's so subjective. It's a bizarre little world."

BARRISTERS/SOLICITORS

PM to Abbas:

Israel won't undermine final status talks

By BARAK RAVID

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israel will not undermine negotiations toward a final-status agreement, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert promised Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas during their meeting in Jerusalem last Thursday.

"Israel will take no steps that would undermine the ability to reach a final-status agreement or that would delay the negotiations," Olmert told Abbas during their first meeting since the Annapolis conference a month ago.

The prime minister made the statement in response to Palestinian complaints about the announced tender for the construction of 307 new homes in the East Jerusalem neighborhood of Har Choma. However, he did not promise that the tender would be halted.

According to one government source, "the sides resolved the differences that had been weighing on the talks and agreed to proceed with negotiations on the core issues." That is the term used to describe the thorniest disputes between Israel and the Palestinians, namely Jerusalem, refugees and borders.

"Both sides wanted to resolve the crisis and recognized that there is no point in stalling the entire process over such an issue," explained another senior government source.

According to that source, Olmert and Abbas agreed that the matter of construction in the territories, as well as in Jerusalem, will be discussed during the negotiations on the core issues.

The two also agreed to resume their bi-weekly meetings, and to have their negotiating teams meet again next week. At that meeting, the teams will seek to reach an agreement on a framework for talks on the core issues.

The Palestinians also raised the issue of a prisoner release, and Olmert told Abbas that Israel intended to "loosen" its definition of "blood on their hands," the euphemism used in Israel to describe Palestinians who were involved in murdering Israelis.

"We are considering the release of veteran prisoners who we are sure will not go back to terrorism, but there is still no decision on this matter," the senior government source said.

At the start of the meeting, Abbas expressed the Palestinians' opposition to further construction at Har Choma and protested the issuance of the tender. In response, Olmert said that "Israel will not construct new settlements, will not confiscate land and will evacuate the illegal outposts."

"Israel wishes to conduct the negotiations with goodwill," the prime minister added.

Two earlier meetings of the negotiating teams, headed respectively by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and former Palestinian prime minister Ahmed Qureia, had gone nowhere, as the talks stalled over the issue of settlement construction.

Last week, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned both Olmert and Abbas and asked them to use their meeting to resolve the impasse. "It is important to me that you progress," Rice told the two leaders, adding that they must not allow the differences between them to widen.

JTA

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert mourned the assassination last Thursday of Pakistani opposition leader Benazir Bhutto, saying she was open to ties with the Jewish state.

"I saw her as someone who could have served as a bridgehead to relations with that part of the Muslim world with whom our ties are naturally limited," Olmert told the Jerusalem Post.

According to Olmert, upon her return to Pakistan two months ago, Bhutto relayed a message through a mutual acquaintance that she would "in the future like to strengthen the ties between Israel and Pakistan."

Israel and Pakistan, the only Muslim country in the world with nuclear weapons, do not currently have diplomatic relations.

Other Israeli leaders, including President Shimon Peres, expressed similar sentiments. "I had the chance to meet her on several occasions, in which she expressed interest in Israel and said that she hoped to visit upon returning to power," Peres said in a statement. "Benazir was a charismatic leader and a fighter for peace in her country and across the world."

The Canadian Jewish Congress issued its own statement condemning the assassination.

"Ms. Bhutto had returned to her beloved country as a champion of democracy but now she has had her name added to the list of world leaders struck down by terrorist violence for that very commitment," said congress co-president Sylvain Abitbol.

"All nations must strive to eliminate the scourge of terrorism and to work toward a stabilized Pakistan in the interests of regional and international stability and peace," he added.

Congress's other co-president, Rabbi Reuven Bulka, echoed Abitbol's sentiment.

"We join with the mourning community in condemning this atrocity, and pray for the souls of the victims, the apprehension of those responsible, and that Pakistan and its people will have the strength and resilience to heal from this terrible blow," Bulka stated.

Congress' immediate past president, Ed Morgan, expressed his organization's condolences to those affected in Canada.

"CJC supports the members of the Pakistani community in Canada who mourn the passing of Benazir Bhutto and the dozens of other innocent victims of recent suicide attacks in Pakistan."

Israel, Egypt spar over smuggling into Gaza

By ROY EITAN

JTA

SHARM EL-SHEIKH, Egypt — Old warriors-turned-statesmen from Israel and Egypt met last week to head off a diplomatic dispute over the smuggling of weapons into the Hamas-led Gaza Strip.

Two days after Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told a Knesset panel that Cairo was doing a "dismal" job of preventing weapons and cash from reaching Gaza via the Egyptian Sinai, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak flew to Egypt to mend fences.

In the languorous Red Sea resort town of Sharm al Sheikh, Barak and a senior Israeli security entourage held intensive talks with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Mubarak's intelligence chief Omar Suleiman, and his defence minister Hussein Tantawi.

The Israelis were at pains to play down Livni's remarks and reaffirm the almost 30-year-old peace accord with Egypt, the key Arab power broker on the Palestinian front. Despite ongoing tensions with Egypt, Israeli officials say the Jewish state can ill afford a crisis in relations with its most powerful Arab diplomatic partner.

Barak, who traded tales with Tantawi about their experiences fighting one another as regimental infantry commanders during the 1973 Yom Kippur War, said after the talks, "I come away persuaded that both sides consider the peace a strategic asset."

"The matter surrounding Tzipi's remarks is behind us," Barak said, though he declined to get into details on what, if any, agreements had been reached with the Egyptians on the arms smuggling. Israel believes Gazan gunrunners have brought tons of weapons and explosives into the Gaza Strip from Egypt since Israel quit Gaza in 2005. The arms smuggling has intensified since Hamas took control of the strip last June.

"On Dec. 26, Israel presented Egypt with surveillance footage that Jerusalem said showed Egyptian border policemen actively abetting smugglers. The Egyptians, who have long complained that the 1978 Camp David accord unfairly limits the number of police it can station on the Gaza frontier, were, at least publicly, unmoved."

"Egypt is tackling all the violations which some people might try to carry out on the Egyptian-Palestinian border," Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said.

Israel has refused Egypt's suggestions that the Camp David accord be reviewed to allow expansion of the Egyptian garrison along the Gaza border.

"Fighting terror is a matter of pinpoint operations against this or that agent or smuggler," a senior Barak aide said. "Egypt has superlative security forces which have ensured that in this country of 72 million people there is no terror."

We want the same in Gaza."

Meanwhile, Gheit accused "the Israeli lobby" in Washington of pushing Congress to trim some of the $2 billion in annual U.S. aid to Egypt.

Barak denied there was an Israeli government initiative to target Cairo's coffers, but the exchange with Gheit coincided with a visit to Israel this week by U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and U.S. Rep. Patrick Kennedy (D-R.I.), who voiced support for withholding U.S. aid to Cairo as leverage to get the Egyptians to take concrete actions against the smuggling.

"We do not push anything in the Congress, but of course our relationship is very close and we answer when we are asked questions," Barak told Egyptian reporters.

On Dec. 25, an unnamed Egyptian official told the Jerusalem Post that Cairo recently bought a multimillion-dollar advanced technological system that will allow it to find tunnels used to smuggle arms under the Egypt-Gaza border.

"It is in our interest to stop the smuggling," the Egyptian official told the Post. "We have no interest in seeing a radical Muslim group, with ties with the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, rise up along our border."

Israel's accusatory tack, the official said, "harms relations between Israel and Egypt and it does the opposite of what we would like to do, which is to strengthen relations."

Israeli experts say Mubarak is not doing all he can to scuttle Hamas in Gaza because Mubarak wants to avoid angering his most potent rivals in Egypt, the Muslim Brotherhood, which spawned the radical Palestinian Islamist movement.

Some experts say Cairo has a vested interest in perpetuating the low-intensity war between Hamas and Israel in Gaza, because it draws public attention in Egypt away from domestic problems like the dearth of civil rights in the country. This is the charge analysts long have levelled at Arab regimes, saying they use the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to distract their populations from problems at home.

In an apparent bid to deflect Israel's criticism, Egypt suggested the government of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was using the smuggling issue to obfuscate Israel's crisis of confidence with the Palestinians over Israeli residential construction in the disputed Har Choma neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

Israel's smuggling charges are "a smoke-screen to shift attention from settlement construction and the follow-up on Annapolis," Mubarak spokesman Suleiman Awad said.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has called the Har Choma project a violation of the 2003 "road map" peace plan and a breach of the joint Israeli-Palestinian statement reached last month at Annapolis, Md., where the two sides pledged to revive bilateral negotiations.

Olmert, who says Jerusalem's neighbourhoods should not be considered part of West Bank land where the Palestinians want a state, is due to meet Abbas on Thursday to sort out the impasse.

Barak shrugged off Awad's charge and, in his public comments, made sure to maintain a cordial tone toward his Egyptian hosts. Besides sharing a border with Gaza, Egypt is seen as an important intermediary for efforts to retrieve Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the Israeli soldier abducted by Palestinian gunmen in June 2006.

Hamas is demanding Israel release hundreds of jailed Palestinian terrorists as ransom for Shalit — something Olmert long has ruled out. But the Israeli prime minister signalled some flexibility this week by appointing a Cabinet committee to review the criteria for which Palestinian inmates might be set free in swap.

After the talks in Egypt, a senior Barak aide said there might be a breakthrough on the Shalit issue, though not imminently.

"My sense is that we will have to relax our position, as will Hamas, until we come to some sort of arrangement," the aide said.

The immigrants who arrived on Dec. 25 flew to Israel through a third country, although which country cannot be published at this time.

There are an estimated 25,000 to 28,000 Jews currently living in Iran. The Islamic government does grant them relative freedom of religion, although they are prevented from learning Hebrew and face certain emigration restrictions.

The operation was sponsored by the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, a charity that funnels millions of dollars from evangelical donors each year.

Yehiel Eckstein, a rabbi who founded the Jewish-evangelical International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, warned in a telephone interview from Chicago that the situation facing Iranian Jews is critical, because of the attitude of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly called for Israel to be wiped off the map.

"Our feeling is that this is very similar to the situation of Jews in Germany in the 1930s," Eckstein said of the threat facing Jews in Iran. "By the time they realize it's not going to blow over, it'll be too late. All it needs is a U.S. or Israeli strike against Iran's nuclear program for them to come down strong on the local Jewish population."

Benjamin Yakobi, 16, has lived in Israel seven years. Waiting for his cousin, he said Israel is safer than Iran. "Here we are all Jewish, and we are not worried that someone will do something," he said.

In 2000, Iranian authorities arrested 10 Jews, convicted them of spying for Israel and sentenced them to prison terms ranging from four to 13 years. An appeals court later reduced their sentences under international pressure and eventually freed them.

No comment was available from the Iranian government or the country's Jewish lawmaker.

According to the New York-based Jewish Agency for Israel — the world organization dedicated to helping Jews immigrate to Israel — the 40 Iranian olim consisted of 10 families and three singles and were being housed in an agency absorption centre in the south of Israel.

"This is a very emotional day for the Jewish people, the State of Israel and for the Jewish Agency that... has stood by Jewish communities in distress throughout the world," said Zeev Bielsky, the agency's executive chairman in a Dec. 27 letter on the JIA website.

"At a time that Iranian Jews languish under conditions of intensified anti-Semitic phenomena, harassment by government institutions, the closure of schools and a prohibition on studying the Hebrew language, I take satisfaction that [we] are leading this historic measure of immigration... and the reunification of the immigrants with their families in Israel."

Russia offers Iran missiles

Russia will provide Iran with an advanced air missile defence system. The agreement for Russia to deliver at an unspecified time the sophisticated S-300 surface air missile defence system was announced last week by Iranian Defence Minister Mostafa Mohammad Najjar. The S-300 is similar to the United States' Patriot missile defence system, which can stop incoming missiles and warplanes. Russia's Foreign Minister

Israel Briefs

Sergei Lavrov told the Russian daily Vremya Novosti newspaper that Iran has no economic need to continue its program of uranium enrichment since taking delivery from Russia of nuclear fuel for its Bushehr nuclear reactor. Iran's production of fissile material at its Natanz plant has caused an uproar in the international community, which is looking at placing additional sanctions on the republic. Lavrov said Russia is working to encourage Iran to halt its production.

Palestinian prisoner release

Two-thirds of Israelis do not want to release jailed Palestinians "with blood on their hands" in a swap for captive soldier Gilad Shalit. Ma'ariv last week published a survey showing that 67 per cent of the public would oppose the release of Palestinians imprisoned for killing Israelis, even if this were a condition for the return of Shalit from Gaza, where he was abducted by Hamas gunmen exactly 18 months ago. Thirty-three per cent of Israelis would agree to an amnesty for those Palestinians "with blood on their hands," a category that has so far been excluded from any discussions of a possible prisoner swap. Hamas demands the release of hundreds of prisoners, including top terrorists, as ransom for Shalit. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert last week appointed a top cabinet committee to review the government's criteria for which inmates may or may not be granted early release. Asked whether the Olmert government should accept Hamas' recent offer of a truce in the Gaza Strip, 59 per cent of those polled by Ma'ariv said no and 36 per cent said yes. The survey had a 4.9 per cent margin of error.

Olmert rules out truce

Ehud Olmert ruled out any truce between Israel and Hamas

in the Gaza Strip. The Israeli prime minister last week quashed talks of a possible ceasefire with the ruling Palestinian Islamist faction in Gaza, reaffirming international demands that Hamas first unilaterally forswear terrorism and accept the Jewish state.

"The State of Israel has no interest in negotiating with those that refuse to accept the basic principles of the Quartet [United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations]," Olmert told his cabinet. "This applies to Hamas, Islamic Jihad and anyone else. He who accepts the Quartet principles is a negotiating partner, but he who is not ready to accept them is no partner and our policy will not change." Israel stepped up airstrikes against Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorists last week following a surge of rocket and mortar attacks from Gaza. That prompted Ismail Haniyeh, Hamas' top leader in Gaza, to offer truce talks with the Olmert government. Some members of Olmert's cabinet said the overture should be considered, while others said a truce would only allow Hamas to rearm and regroup. "This war will continue," Olmert told his cabinet, referring to the Gaza offensive.

Scientists create nano-Bible

Technion researchers have put a full version of the Hebrew Bible on an area the size of a grain of sugar. According to a statement from the Technion-Israeli Institute of Technology, located in Haifa, the nano-Bible, written in Hebrew with vowel points and placed in an area of 0.5 square millimetres, was part of an educational program developed by the Russell Berrie Nanotechnology Institute to increase young people's interest in nanoscience and nanotechnology. The idea to write the Bible on an area smaller than a pinhead was conceived by Uri Sivan, head of the Nanotechnology Institute. The 300,000 Hebrew words were written on a silicon surface using a focused ion beam.

Two Israelis killed

Two Israelis were killed Friday in a drive-by shooting in the south Hebron Hills. The two men were hiking in the area of the Talam and Adura settlements with a female resident of Kiryat Arba, when a group of terrorists opened fire on them from a Jeep.

Joint Israeli-Palestinian project cleaning up the Alexander River

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

KIBBUTZ YAD HANNA, Israel—Yohanan Oron, a 65-year-old conservationist, was talking about the Alexander River, which flows from the West Bank city of Nablus to the Mediterranean Sea.

"When I was a youngster, I used to swim in the Alexander," he said wistfully. "But if I jumped into the river today, I would not feel so good."

Oron's friend, a woman sporting a sardonic smile, laughed. "It would make you sick," she exclaimed.

Thirty-two kilometres long, and once one of Israel's most beautiful rivers, the Alexander River is a pale imitation of its former self today, having been polluted by industrial and agricultural wastes and effluents and now buckling under the weight of development pressures.

The Alexander is one of several rivers in Israel threatened by environmental degradation. Among the others are the Kishon and the Yarkon, which empty into the sea in Haifa and Tel Aviv respectively.

Keenly aware that the condition of the river can only be ignored at their peril, Israel and the Palestinian Authority have taken concrete steps to solve the problem.

In a collaborative effort transcending the bitter politics of the Arab-Israeli conflict, the mayor of the Hefer Valley Regional Council and the governor of the adjoining Tulkarem district signed agreements in 1996 and 1998 to save it.

The cross-border project, financed by Germany and managed in part by the Jewish National Fund, was inaugurated in 2003, when the second Palestinian uprising burned brightly.

As the intifadah raged and the casualties mounted, Israel severed formal relations with the Palestinian Authority. Yet the Alexander River project remained untouched by the troubles, and continues to function under the name of the Alexander River Restoration Administration.

Its mandate is to remove pollutants, preserve the aquifer tapped into by both Israelis and Palestinians, restore landscapes and ecosystems and develop the river for recreational purposes.

According to Amos Brandeis, the chief planner, the project is more than about the physical environment. "It's about creating an atmosphere of peace and co-operation."

His Palestinian counterpart, Hussein El Aarage, agrees. "Peace will evolve through co-operative endeavours such as this."

At the heart of the project is a complex of sewage treatment pools and pipes that connect Tulkarem to a wastewater treatment centre in Kibbutz Yad Hanna, a left-wing settlement that absorbed families removed from West Bank settlements in the summer of 2005 under Ariel Sharon's unilateral disengagement plan.

Considered the leading river restoration project in Israel today, its broad objectives are nothing if not ambitious.

The Alexander River, near Kibbutz Haogen

In concert with the ministry of the environment, the Jewish National Fund has worked to rehabilitate the banks of the river, prevent erosion and create picnic areas and hiking trails.

As a result, fish, water fowl and the near-extinct Nile soft-shelled turtle have begun to return to their natural habitat.

Since these turtles have virtually disappeared from Israel's coastline, due to deteriorating water quality, the Alexander River now has the distinction of being their primary preserve.

That these turtles appear to be thriving attests to the fact that the quality of the water in the river has improved.

Oron, a resident of a nearby moshav settled by German Jews, agrees that there has been progress. "It was much worse only a few years ago," he said, noting that the river has a long way to go before it can be considered pristine.

Foam, a tell-tale sign of pollution, still mars its purity.

During the autumn, when olive presses in the West Bank are working full tilt, the colour of water turns black and green, Oron said.

And during summer months, when limestone plants in the area discharge waste materials, the water trends to turn a shade of white and gray, he added.

Oron, who has lived in the Hefer Valley all his life, wants to ensure that its agricultural economy is not tarnished, never mind ruined, by the scourge of pollution.

Farmers in the valley tend to citrus and avocados, groves, fruit orchards, vegetables, flowers, dairy herds and poultry.

The renewal of Jewish settlement in the valley was made possible when the Jewish National Fund purchased land there starting in 1929. The funds were provided by the Jewish community in Canada.

A year later, the first Jewish settlers founded Kfar Vitkin, a co-operative farming village, or moshav.

The first building in which they lived stands on a bluff in the Biran Aharon Nature Reserve, an exquisite piece of real estate of which few visitors are aware.

Son publishes his father's letters from the Gulag

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Some of the letters written from a Siberian prison by Ferenc Roth, who was incarcerated in the Gulag for 12 years and perished without a trace, were recently published in Russian and translated into Hungarian and English.

Father's Letters from Siberian Prison was written and compiled by Roth's son Vladimir Roth, 72. In 1936, the family lost its right to spell their name "Roth" and had to change it to "Rott."

The book contains an introduction by the son that vividly describes historical events in Hungary and the Soviet Union from the 1920s until after his father's death in 1950. The book also includes photos and copies of some of his father's letters.

"I am not a writer," Vladimir told The CJN, "however, I must tell about the people, most of whom are no longer among us. I wanted to preserve the memories of the past events, the lessons of courage and determination and challenges that anyone could face in life. I wanted to tell about the great life."

Roth and his mother left the Soviet Union in 1974 on the pretense that they were going to Toronto to visit family. They defected, leaving behind his wife and children, his brother and other family members.

An engineer, Roth says that over the years family members and friends have asked him to tell them about his experiences and the traumatic events he witnessed in Hungary during the years he lived there.

It was on a holiday with family that he decided to document his memories for his children and grandchildren. He says that he kept diaries from the time he was a child.

His father's letters, hidden in a green canvas briefcase, were smuggled out of the Soviet Union in 1983 by friends.

In the introduction of Father's Letters from Siberian Prison, Roth tells the love story of his father and mother who met during the World War I. His father was an 18-year-old soldier in the Hungarian army, and he met 16-year-old Regina Spielberger at a border checkpoint. Because of their responsibilities to their families, they were not able to marry until 1926, nine years after they met.

Their first son, Joseph, was born in Miskolc. The family moved to Boborok, where Vladimir was born in 1935.

In 1936, they immigrated to Belarus, and Ferenc, who was an expert in lumber-mill production, got a job in the lumber business.

When Vladimir was three years old, on July 4, 1938, his father was abducted by two NKVD (secret police) men and thrown into a truck without any explanation.

The family later found out from a man who was released from a camp located in the Gorki region of the Gulag (because he had tuberculosis) that Ferenc had been beaten daily for weeks, and after weeks of being tortured, he signed an admission that he was "an enemy and destroyer of the state."

His family heard nothing else from him for almost a year after his capture. He was banished to Kolyma, a labour camp in Siberia, from which he never returned.

Vladimir's memories of his mother's courage and intelligence and her ability to survive under Nazi occupation with her two sons is moving.

Ferenc's letters, published in Vladimir's book, are dated from Oct. 31, 1945, to Nov. 5, 1950. They tell of 12 years of suffering, anguish and the deprivation that he and the other prisoners in the Gulag underwent. His father was never heard from again after the letter in 1950.

Vladimir says that he is determined to continue to expose this period in history, and he wants future generations to have access to information about his experiences for educational purposes.

He is currently working on an 18-chapter book, Joy from Sadness (Chapter 10 is titled Father's Letters from Siberian Prison). That book is to be followed by another one, Joy of Discovery.

Vladimir and his wife, Iya, a retired professor who taught in the civil engineering department of the University of Toronto, have three children and five grandchildren.

The Russian edition of Father's Letters from Siberian Prison is available at the Erudit Russian Bookstore, 616 Sheppard Ave. West. The English edition is available at Negev Importing, 3509 Bathurst St. The Hungarian edition is available by calling Vladimir Roth at 416-782-3175.

Architect's installation will go backwards in time

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Toronto architect Alexander Josephson was walking through Rome about two years ago, when he spotted a man facing east and lying almost level with the ground, praying.

This was the inspiration for his art installation, Islam Part 3, the first of a planned three-part work called Trinity. It began with Islam and will move backwards through time with Christianity Part 2 and Judaism Part 1, which he expects to complete the within the next year or two.

"I came up with the project based on that man," Josephson, 26, said recently at a Yorkville café. "I haven't seen a Muslim pray in public since [then]. It's not the norm to see people praying in the street."

For Islam Part 3, the architect installed 75 polystyrene sculptural impressions or moulds totalling 60 metres long, spread out on the lawn of Queen's Park last July 16.

The impressions are shaped so that a person can lie in them, so that they are essentially negative impressions of the human form in prayer.

"I became interested in the negative impressions humans make in space," Josephson said. "While making impressions, I started thinking about what mattered in the world."

"Through discussions with friends, Sept. 11 and the mystery around it evolved. People take for granted that Muslims dislike Americans and that's why the [World Trade Center] buildings were bombed. That led me to Trinity's Part 3 — the mysterious physical force and prayer, a symbol of Islam with no crucifix or image of god."

In explaining what he is trying to convey, Josephson referred to the word "resistance," breaking it down to "resist" and "stance."

"There's resistance to ignorance and resistance to powers. That's my position in politics. What gives anyone the right to say that one way is better than another?" he said.

Choosing a public space like Queen's Park for his protest was part of the statement he wanted to make. "When you're young, you don't have the ability to show in galleries, as they're more concerned with commodities. Historically, galleries of Paris were revolutionary; they were about harvesting genius. That's not their role today."

"Some galleries will exhibit but modify work, but only some do installations and build a project — a political manifestation that I'm attracted to. I'm not trying to put something on a wall and ask someone to appreciate it. I'm trying to react against authority."

He felt the impact of using the public space when he met a Muslim family who drove from Oakville to Queen's Park to see the installation.

"They were typical people. I liked that nothing dictated to a certain demographic. The father had six children of various ages. It's rare that a father goes to the Art Gallery of Ontario to see a specific sculpture, but they came to see me. That was empowering. In a free society like Toronto, Queen's Park is a powerful venue. It may not be good for showing paintings, but for what I do, it's perfect. I'm interested in being a kind of political probe."

The planned two-day installation was cut short, however. Rumours spread that there were threats, although nothing could be further from the truth. Still, Josephson packed it in when Queen's Park demanded that two Ontario Provincial Police officers be hired to protect the grounds if Islam Part 3 remained on the grounds overnight.

What can we expect from parts 2 and 1?

"Christianity Part 2 will not have a central location. It'll appear in multiple places throughout the city, as the religion is open to anyone. Trinity's Judaism Part 1 stems from the Wailing Wall, the abstract ruin people identify Judaism and Jerusalem with. It's based on the idea of a mythic structure and davening — the harmonic movement."

As for Islam Part 3: "I'll install it again once I get permission from Ottawa's Parliament Buildings, Washington's White House and Hyde Park in London. It's an uphill battle, but it just doesn't die."

FRESH PRODUCE FROM THE LITERARY VINEYARDS

Each month, a variety of new literary works are sent to CJN reviewers, many originating within our very talented Toronto Jewish community. There are usually more titles than we have space to review; often, we can do little more than mention them in passing. Here are descriptions of two such books that came to us recently over the proverbial transom.

Second Novel from John Miller: A Sharp Intake of Breath (Simon and Pierre Fiction). Toronto author John Miller's second novel, tells the story of Herman (Toshy) Wolfman, who grows up in a left-wing Jewish family in Toronto during the 1930s.

Miller utilizes the Somerset Maugham-ian device of a physical deformity – in Toshy's case, a split lip and cleft palate – to indicate that his protagonist faces uphill odds in life. Ridiculed as dim-witted and ugly, he ends up imprisoned after stealing a famous diamond in an episode reminiscent of Svend Robinson.

Toshy's sisters, Lil and Bessie, provide additional colour: the former is a devotee of anarchist Emma Goldman. The Featherbed, Miller's earlier novel (2002), offered a credible depiction of tenement life in New York's Lower East Side of a century ago, with a number of jarring twists and more than a pinch of radical gender politics.

Holocaust Memoir: Torontonian Joseph Peretz has written The Collaborator, a work of historical fiction that chronicles multiple generations caught in the grip of two world wars.

Peretz, who was born in Belgium in 1921, uses his personal experiences as a Belgian Holocaust survivor to paint a detailed portrait of Antwerp in the first half of the 20th century. The Collaborator was published by iuniverse (www.iuniverse.com).

Names in the News: Born in southern Ontario in 1928, retired Toronto businessman Hy Burstein is carving a niche for himself in the literary industry.

Burstein first set pen to paper several years ago to write Ride 'Em Jewish Cowboy, an entertaining memoir of his experiences riding horses around the world. A novel, Unforgiven Anger, quickly followed; the story is set in both Canada and Israel. Then came Rage Against Religion, a non-fiction treatise on the shortcomings of world religions such as Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

Last year, Burstein felt the call again. After reading of the brutal torture and murder of Ilan Halimi, a young Jewish cellphone salesman in Paris, he felt compelled to go to Paris to research the facts behind the newspaper headlines. His first stop was the local police station. For several days, a pair of French detectives showed him around the crime scene in a rundown neighbourhood in the Paris suburbs and introduced him to those associated with the case. He saw the dank basement where Halimi was tortured, spoke with the paramedic who was with him when he died, met the victim's grieving brother-in-law and learned more about the anti-Semitic gang, known as the Barbarians, that was responsible for this outrage.

After months of research, Burstein has produced a book about the crime and its perpetrators. The book is tentatively titled The Paris Barbarians and the Murder that Horrified France, and is reportedly slated for publication soon. "TWO HISTORIC CIVILIZATIONS"

Toronto Rabbi Gary Zweig is hosting his fourth trip to Israel, this time with two days in Greece. The theme is "Two Historic Civilizations" and the tour guide will focus on both, particularly the influence of Greek culture on the ancient Hebrews.

The itinerary includes visits to Sefat, the Golan Heights, Jerusalem, Ma'ale Adumim, the Dead Sea, and a moshav where participants may learn about the laws of shmittah. "The trip will be great for first timers," said Zweig, adding that Israel's 60th anniversary celebrations will be a special bonus. "The 60th year is really a great time to visit – it's going to be a banner year," he said.

Travel dates are June 16 to 26. Kosher arrangements in Greece provided by Chabad of Athens. For more details, please phone 905-886-6305.

Rabbi Zweig, by the way, has just published Living Kaddish, a guidebook on saying Kaddish (available on Amazon.com).

Kol Israel Summer Soul: Kol announces a new educational tour led by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein. Set for Aug. 17 to 26, the tour hits all the summer highlights of sites, restaurants, outdoor beauty, and experiences in Israel, and is geared for couples, singles or families ages 16 and up. For a full itinerary and price, please call 416-636-1880, ext. 472 or email michelle@peerlesstravel.com. Spaces are limited.

Ancient Mansion Uncovered: A mansion being excavated near the Dung Gate to Jerusalem's Old City may have been a palace belonging to Queen Helene of Adiabene, the Israel Antiquities Authority has announced.

The excavation has uncovered massive foundations, a basement with an arched ceiling, halls two stories high, walls as high as five meters, and remnants of colored frescoes and ritual baths. Dig director Dr. Doron Ben-Ami said the structure was of unusual proportions for the Second Temple period and may have belonged to the royal family of Adiabene, a kingdom on the upper Tigris River of which Queen Helene was the best-known member.

Known in Jewish sources as a righteous woman, Helene converted to Judaism some 2,000 years ago and moved to Jerusalem, where she built grand residences in the area of the City of David. She is mentioned in the Babylonian (tractate Yoma) and Jerusalem Talmuds, and in Roman-era Jewish historian Josephus's book, The Antiquities of the Jews. Two streets in the heart of the capital's downtown are named for her and her son.

Fine Art at Ticho House: Women's portraits by Picasso, Modigliani and Matisse, went on view recently at the Anna Ticho House, a satellite campus of the Israel Museum.

The paintings are part of a series titled "A Room of Her Own: Portraits of Women from the Israel Museum Collection", that addresses the subject of women in portraiture from the 19th century to today.

Ticho House, situated in Jerusalem's downtown area, was one of the first houses built outside the Old City walls. Filled with art, the house is named for Dr. Avraham Ticho and his wife Anna Ticho, the latter of whom bequeathed the house, its collections and library to the people of the city. It is also home to the popular Little Jerusalem Restaurant and Café. The current exhibit remains on view until Feb. 20.

New Mike Nichols film focuses on Cold War politics

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

An all-star cast does not necessarily guarantee success in a film. Nor does a reputable director always live up to expectations.

But in Mike Nichols' latest movie, Charlie Wilson's War, starring Tom Hanks, Philip Seymour Hoffman and Julia Roberts, the stars are in alignment.

The beauty of Charlie Wilson's War, set shortly after the 1979 Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, lies in its ability to fuse Cold War politics with bedroom antics and the savagery of war with high idealism.

That all these disparate elements connect in seamless fashion is in no small part due to Nichols, his accomplished actors and Aaron Sorkin, the screenwriter.

Hanks plays Charlie Wilson, a morally flawed but likeable Texas congressman-cum-womanizer who wants to help Muslim fighters oust the Soviet army from Afghanistan. Roberts, portraying a rich socialite who sleeps her way around Capitol Hill, encourages him. Hoffman, a dishevelled and smart Central Intelligence Agency spook whose views coincide with Wilson's, masterminds the covert scheme to defeat the Soviets.

At the heart of this entertaining film is Wilson's effort to enlist pro-American allies in the general region – Pakistan, Israel and Egypt – to assist the mujahedeen.

Israel and Egypt will provide the Soviet-made weaponry the Islamic freedom fighters desperately need to turn the tide of battle.

Pakistan will allow the Afghans the use of its territory to funnel the military equipment to their bases. Keenly alert to Muslim sensitivities, Pakistan's president, played by Indian actor Om Puri, archly insists that Israel's shipments should not be marked with a Star of David.

Charlie Wilson's War unfolds in Washington, Pakistan, Egypt and Israel. The single Israeli scene takes place in an outdoor café in Jerusalem. There, within sight of the golden dome of the Temple Mount, Wilson – a legislator with a pro-Israel record in Congress despite the virtual absence of Jews in his district – convinces a senior Mossad operative to funnel the weapons to the Afghans.

Whether Israel ever donated or sold weapons to the mujahedeen – who morphed into the Taliban – is irrelevant. What counts here is that Israel, Egypt and Pakistan have a common interest in striking a blow for liberty and weakening the Soviet Union.

Unfortunately, once the Red Army withdrew from Afghanistan, Islamic radicals filled the vacuum, the United States having had no interest in assisting the Afghan to rebuild their country. This is the message that rings loud and clear in Charlie Wilson's War.

A primer on Israel's settlements in the territories

Lords of the Land by Idith Zertal and Akiva Eldar, Nation Books.

By SHELTON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel and the Palestinian Authority officially resumed final status negotiations last month for the first time in seven years, hoping to reach a global agreement by the end of 2008, as set out by last November's Arab-Israeli peace conference in Annapolis, Md.

The talks, the first of many more to come, will deal with such core issues as Israeli settlements in the West Bank.

By any measure, this is a devilishly thorny issue, complicated by the fact that the West Bank – excluding territory in eastern Jerusalem annexed by Israel after the Six Day War – is home to about 270,000 Israeli Jews, most of whom would fiercely resist repatriation back to Israel.

In Lords of the Land, Idith Zertal and Akiva Eldar delve into this highly charged topic from a left-of-centre perspective.

Zertal is an Israeli historian who has written two books about the Holocaust and currently teaches at the Institute of Jewish Studies at the University of Basel. Eldar is the chief political columnist and editorial writer for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

Proceeding from the assumption that the settlements have prolonged Israel's military occupation of the West Bank, they argue that the occupation contravenes international law (which prohibits an occupying power from transferring its citizens into an occupied territory). The Israeli government, heaving to the belief that the West Bank is disputed territory, claims it is not in violation of the Geneva Convention.

Not buying this argument, Zertal and Eldar say that the occupation – a guarantor of the settlements' continued existence – has sullied Israel's image, rendered a rapprochement with the Palestinians all the harder to achieve, corroded Israeli morality and now threatens Israel's status as a democratic Jewish state.

Their view of the security barrier – which in part is being built to ensure that the major settlements remain in Israel's hands, even if a deal with the Palestinians is actually signed – is similarly jaundiced. Taken together with the web of roadblocks Israel has set up, the security fence thwarts the free movement of Palestinians and separates them from their lands, institutions and relatives.

All this is true, but Zertal and Eldar do not pay sufficient attention to the problem that originally prompted Israel to build the security fence – the prevalence of Palestinian terrorism.

In this respect, their ideological proclivities occasionally cloud their judgment, but on the whole, Lords of the Land remains one of the most comprehensive works on the subject.

The authors maintain that the Israeli government, even when it was ambivalent, sanctioned the construction of the settlements through a piecemeal process of deception, concealment and denial. In short, Israel adopted "a policy of ambiguity and vagueness" while refraining from annexing the West Bank.

From the outset, they observe, it was clear that Israeli settlements in the new territories would have far-reaching implications. Some believed that they could be used as a lever to extract Arab recognition of Israel, while others saw them as a way to block future talks with the Arabs. The official government line was that they could be an asset in Arab-Israeli negotiations.

The Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence service, recommended shortly after the Six Day War that a Palestinian state, based on the 1949 truce lines, with minor adjustments, should be established under the auspices of the Israeli army and in agreement with the Palestinian leadership. If the Mossad's suggestion had been taken seriously, not a single Israeli settlement would have gone up.

Moshe Dayan, Israel's defence minister, was at odds with the Mossad and insisted that Israel should build settlements along the hilltops that overlook Israel's heavily populated coastal plain. Yigal Allon, a War of Independence commander who would be Israel's foreign minister, took a tougher approach, warning against the return of a single inch of the West Bank and claiming that a peace treaty with the Arabs was "the weakest guarantee of the future."

As these debates raged, they write, Hannan Porat, a Zionist from the national religious camp whom the authors describe as "the first settler," urged the prime minister, Levi Eshkol, to "restore the former glory of the Etzion bloc," a string of Jewish settlements that had been overrun by the Arab Legion in the 1948 war.

Eshkol, a moderate, regarded the idea as a one-time gesture to the descendants of settlers who had been killed in Gush Etzion. "Yet this modest move proved to be but the first step in a long march and a huge project," write Zertal and Eldar.

Once Gush Etzion was in the pipeline, there was no stopping dedicated and driven people who shared Porat's zeal. By stealth, Rabbi Moshe Levinger brought Jews back to Hebron. Gush Emonim, formed in the wake of the Yom Kippur War, created a model settlement in Ofra.

Yitzhak Rabin, the prime minister after the 1973 war, regarded the settlement movement as "a very grave phenomenon, a cancer in the body of Israeli democracy." Yet in the Sebastia affair, which the writers call a turning point in the history of the settlements, he approved the establishment of the pivotal Kedumim outpost.

Menachem Begin, the first Likud prime minister, had no such qualms. "These are liberated territories, which belong to the Jewish people," he declared. "The new government will call upon young people to come and settle the land."

True to his word, Begin appointed his agricultural minister, Ariel Sharon, to reshape the map of the territories. Pledging to settle two million Jews there by the end of the 20th century, he oversaw the construction of numerous new settlements, all of which were designed to thwart the emergence of a viable Palestinian state with territorial contiguity. Sharon's successor, Yuval Ne'man, was just as committed to these objectives, Zertal and Eldar say.

By the end of 1983, the Likud government had approved the construction of 103 settlements, compared to 22 built in the first decade of the occupation. Begin's hard-as-nails successor, Yitzhak Shamir, considered the settlements "a domestic Israeli matter."

Rabin, in his second term of office, imposed restrictions on the expansion of settlements, but his freeze did not apply to the greater Jerusalem area or the Jordan Valley. Peres, who succeeded Rabin, poured yet more funds into the territories, while the next two prime ministers, Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak, stepped up the pace of construction.

Zertal and Eldar contend that the settlements, more than any other factor, determined Israel's position during the ill-fated Camp David summit in July 2000. Barak, for example, insisted on keeping settlement blocs where 80 per cent of settlers live.

And judging by his most recent statements, the current prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has a similar policy.

It's clear that the settlements will have an enormous impact on the outcome of negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. Only two weeks ago, following a donors conference in Paris to aid the Palestinians attain statehood, Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, called on Israel to halt all settlement activity.

In Lords of the Land, Zertal and Eldar place the topic in context and explain precisely why this crucial issue must be resolved now and for all.

Sarah Fulford takes over Toronto Life magazine

By SHELTON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The new year is ushering in a fresh chapter in Sarah Fulford's career. Fulford, whose appointment as editor of Toronto Life was announced last September, officially succeeded her predecessor and mentor, John Macfarlane, on Jan. 1.

"I'm thrilled," said Fulford, who at 33 is one of Canada's youngest major magazine editors. "It's a huge challenge, but I've been training for it for a long time."

The daughter of one of Toronto's most prominent media couples, Robert Fulford and Geraldine Sherman, she joined Toronto Life in 1999.

"I truly believe I'm walking into a situation where all the conditions are right," said Fulford in an interview in a Little Italy café. "The staff is fantastic. The publishers are enthusiastic and committed to improving the magazine. The city is more vibrant than ever and interested in Toronto Life's success. I feel lucky due to all these conditions."

With a paid circulation of 92,000 and a readership of 765,000, it is fat and profitable. Under Macfarlane's 15-year tutelage, it won 53 National Magazine Awards.

"Sometimes, you take a new job to fix a catastrophe," said Fulford, who is its first female and Jewish editor. "But Toronto Life is healthy. I won't have to spend all my time solving problems. It's not a magazine that needs a radical overhaul."

Yet she plans to revitalize it by hiring new staffers and a new art director, who, she feels, will change its flavour.

In addition, Fulford intends to upgrade its website so that it will appeal to a wider audience, preferably younger readers who were not necessarily born in Toronto, as well as new immigrants.

And she will be flexible in reacting to events. "Things might evolve in unexpected ways," she said, declining to elaborate. But she added that changes will be introduced incrementally.

Fulford was offered the job last summer after a fairly intensive search process. But she and Macfarlane had been discussing her future for several years.

Macfarlane said that Fulford was chosen because she understands the city and is exceedingly able.

"Toronto is a big, complex and diverse city, and she grasps its complexity completely. She also has a grasp of Toronto Life's role in the city. She's a visionary, ambitious in the best sense of the word and very talented editorially. So that made her the best candidate."

Toronto Life, published by St. Joseph Media, has been a presence in Fulford's life since her childhood.

Her parents were avid readers, and one of their favourite publications was Toronto Life, which Fulford considered fun, fearless and stimulating.

Along with her brother and sisters, she was raised in what she describes as "a secular and pluralistic post-Enlightenment environment" where ideas and cultural and intellectual pursuits were valued and encouraged.

Her father, the former editor of Saturday Night, a columnist at the National Post, a contributor to Toronto Life and an Officer of the Order of Canada, never tried to steer her toward journalism.

But he was so engaged by journalism that his dedication rubbed off on her.

"If he had been miserable as a journalist, I might have become a doctor," mused Fulford.

Her mother, a writer and a former radio producer at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, was also influential.

When Fulford was a child, she would critique tapes her mother edited for a popular program. Fulford's comments were so telling and true that her mom would congratulate her on her natural editing abilities.

But as Fulford tells it, she did not seriously consider journalism as a calling until she went to Israel for a year in the summer of 1996 and began writing book reviews for the Jerusalem Report. Since then, she has also written reviews for the National Post and features for the Globe and Mail.

A graduate of King's College in Halifax, with a BA degree in classics and contemporary studies, Fulford spent an academic year studying classical Jewish texts at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies, an independent modern Orthodox institution in Jerusalem that welcomes male and female students of all Jewish backgrounds and beliefs.

"I wanted to explore my Jewish identity and learn the tradition," explained Fulford, whose family celebrates major Jewish holidays and enjoys Friday night Sabbath dinners.

She also studied at a Hebrew University ulpan, where she learned the rudiments of Hebrew.

"Like every Jew, I felt at home in Israel, though I had never been there before."

The occasional suicide bombing did not faze her. "I was young and felt invincible, and there was a spirit of hope in Israel during that period."

She pondered aliyah, but decided against it because of her attachment to Canada's pluralistic society. Yet after returning to Toronto, she took Hebrew classes at the Jewish Community Centre.

Fulford believes very strongly in Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. "But my peers don't always agree with me," she noted.

In a reference to the prospect of peace in the Middle East, she said, "Israel has a right to make its own arrangements with the Palestinians and shouldn't be pressured."

After Israel, Fulford worked for Elm Street, a now-defunct magazine where she honed her talents as an editor. Hired by Toronto Life as an assistant editor, she was promoted to the position of senior editor six years later.

Her duties ranged from editing stories to "packaging" special features. She was always pleased when one of her cover story concepts struck a chord with readers, but was happiest when she took risks on inexperienced writers and discovered that they exceeded expectations.

From time to time, she contributed stories to the magazine. A serious cello player in her leisure hours, she wrote pieces on her high school music teacher, who was exposed as a pedophile, and on car theft in Toronto.

Fulford is married to Stephen Marche, a novelist and academic from Edmonton with whom she has an infant son, Elijah.

Marche's first novel, Raymond and Hannah, turns on sexual desire. Hannah, one of the main characters, runs off to Israel to become more Jewish. Hannah sounds a lot like Fulford, but Fulford laughed off the similarity as purely coincidental.

Survey data spark debate over intermarriage picture

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

SAN FRANCISCO — Intermarriage: disaster for the Jews, not great for the Jews, or simply a fact of Jewish life?

Ever since the 1990 National Jewish Population Study showed more than half of new Jewish marriages involve a non-Jewish partner, many Jewish communal leaders have latched onto the issue with pit bull tenacity — and they haven't let go, even after the 2000-2001 NJPS showed intermarriage had leveled off.

Now a new round of studies is prompting more questions: Does intermarriage necessarily mean the end of that family's connection to Judaism? Or is the Jewish community focusing on intermarriage to the exclusion of other, perhaps more telling, factors?

Most studies report the data in simple comparative fashion, which shows that intermarried families are much less Jewishly involved than unmarried families, from their beliefs to their practices.

But a provocative new study out of Brandeis University questions that research method and its conclusions.

The study — "It's Not Just Who Stands Under the Chupah: Jewish Identity and Intermarriage," by Leonard Saxe, Fern Chertok and Benjamin Phillips of the Cohen Center for Jewish Studies and Steinhardt Social Research Institute — found that when one considers the Jewish background of the Jewish partner in an intermarriage, the difference in the Jewish beliefs and practices of intermarried and intermarried families becomes much less glaring.

And in some measures, like attachment to Israel, the gap almost disappears.

A second study casts further doubt on the deterministic effect of intermarriage. Set for release this month, the study by the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston will show that the children being raised Jewishly in the city's intermarried families look pretty much like any other non-Orthodox Jewish children.

The study's... conclusions have profound policy implications: instead of writing off intermarried families or pressing the non-Jewish partner to convert, the Jewish community would do better to invest in quality Jewish education — formal and informal — to give the Jewish partner in an intermarriage the background and desire to create a Jewish home and raise Jewish children.

"The objective doesn't have to be conversion but the creation of positive, rich Jewish experiences," Saxe explains. "Jewish education, Jewish home experiences, Jewish camp, Israeli experiences — that's what leads to engagement in Jewish life whether one is intermarried or not."

Saxe presented the study's findings with Chertok on Dec. 14 at the Union for Reform Judaism biennial in San Diego.

"The usual model says you get intermarried and you lose your Jewish identity. That's not true," Chertok says. "A far more powerful predictor of what you're going to do in your home are such things as did you have a Jewish education growing up? Were you raised with Jewish rituals in the home? What was your high school social network like?"

Chertok and Saxe drew the strongest audience reaction when they displayed two charts, one showing the Jewish involvement of intermarried vs. in-married families without any controls, and one showing the results after they were controlled for the Jewish partner's religious background.

Without controls, the in-married family blew the intermarried family out of the mikvah: 78 per cent of in-married couples said they were raising their children Jewishly vs. 39 per cent of intermarried couples. Those are the figures used by most Jewish researchers, Chertok and Saxe noted.

But when controlling the other factors, including the Jewish partner's religious upbringing, the gap closed, with 71 per cent of in-married couples and 51 per cent of couples saying they are raising Jewish children.

Similarly, the 53 per cent of in-married vs. 12 per cent of intermarried families who reported being members of Jewish organizations became 45 per cent and 32 per cent when the controls were applied.

The differences become even more striking when controls are applied to the data on the Jewish identity of the adult children of intermarriage.

A simple comparison, one used in most studies, states that 89 per cent of adults who grew up with two Jewish parents identify as Jewish vs. 24 per cent of adults who grew up in an interfaith home.

When the background of those individuals was taken into account, the gap shrank to 94 per cent of the adults with two Jewish parents vs. 76 per cent from intermarried homes.

"Intermarriage is not deterministic," Saxe concluded. "If someone grows up with positive Jewish identity and Jewish educational experiences such as religious school, summer camp, Israel trips, one wants to raise Jewish children regardless of who one falls in love with."

Among those who is not convinced by the Saxe-Chertok line of argument is Steven Cohen, a professor of Jewish social policy at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York. Cohen has conducted several studies that all show the determinative effect of intermarriage.

Cohen's first question is how the researchers defined "being raised Jewish." But he also says they need to look at the second generation: According to the 2000-2001 NJPS study, just 13 per cent of the grandchildren of an intermarriage — that is, people whose grandparents were intermarried — now identify as Jews.

On those grounds alone, Cohen declared, the Jewish community should "not grow complacent" about intermarriage but should continue to combat it as a real threat to Jewish continuity.

"In fact, intermarriage over two generations is more powerful than any other factor in predicting ritual observance, and certainly in predicting whether the grandchildren will be Jewish," he said.

Cohen's conclusion is supported in part by a new report on the U.S. Jewish population prepared for the 2007 American Jewish Yearbook by professors Ira Sheskin of the University of Miami and Arnold Dashevsky of the University of Connecticut.

Comparing data from 49 U.S. Jewish communities, Sheskin and Dashevsky note that while some cities "have been more successful than others in convincing intermarried families to raise their children Jewish," it is nevertheless "clear that intermarriage has a negative effect on measures of Jewishness, and therefore on Jewish continuity."

Intermarriage has a snowball effect, the Sheskin-Dashevsky study concludes, but the ball can roll either way, with much depending on the larger Jewish community.

That's where the Combined Jewish Philanthropies study comes into play.

Gil Preuss, vice-president for strategy and planning, says the organization is less interested in debating research methods than in examining the real effect of community investment in outreach and Jewish education in Boston.

The CJP caused a stir in November 2006 when it released a study by the Steinhardt Institute showing that in the Boston area, 60 per cent of children from intermarried homes were being raised as Jews. Preuss admits that he and his colleagues were initially suspicious of those figures.

So he and his team investigated the data, looking closely at the responses to specific questions about Jewish beliefs and behaviors. Preuss says they found that intermarried families who have decided to raise their kids Jewishly look pretty much like other, non-Orthodox Jewish families.

"They belong to congregations, they celebrate Jewish holidays, they participate in the community," he said. "That is the key decision — whether you decide to raise the kids Jewish. All else follows from that."

Intermarriage itself, the study suggests, is not the determining factor.

"This provides a basis for the notion that we need to create a community that welcomes them in, that says, look, there's something good here — Jewish values, Jewish learning," he said.

Alex Shnaider buys Maccabi Tel Aviv

By DAVID MAROUANI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

A three-way meeting on Dec. 18 between Loni Herzikovic, Ronni Maneh and David Federman paved the way for Herzikovic to sell his controlling stake in the Maccabi Tel Aviv soccer club to Canadian Jewish businessman Alex Shnaider.

The deal had been held up over Maneh's insistence on receiving the 19.4 million shekels or $5 million (Cdn) he claims to have invested in the club. At the meeting, Federman, a co-owner of the club with Herzikovic, suggested a compromise formula under which Maneh would receive his money back, with most of it – 15.4 million shekels or $3.4 million – coming from Herzikovic, who has been looking to sell the club for some time.

Maccabi Tel Aviv is one of Israel's oldest, most decorated soccer teams.

Under the deal, Shnaider will hold 80 per cent of Maccabi, while the other 20 per cent will be purchased by the Maccabi Tel Aviv Association, which is headed by Eldad Buchsen. Buchsen says he already has raised the money he needs, adding, "the demand was greater than expected."

The total cost of the deal is reported to be around $17.3 million.

"I am extremely excited about what the future holds for the team and its fans, and look forward to entering into a successful new era of ownership with our partners the Maccabi Tel Aviv Sporting Club," he said in a statement last month.

In 2005 Shnaider purchased the Jordan Formula One racing team for $50 million (US) and rebranded it as Midland F1 Racing. It has since been resold.

Shnaider, who studied economics at York University and is president of Toronto's Jewish Russian Community Centre, is a co-founder of the Midland Group, an international trading and investment holding company, and has a reported personal worth of nearly $1 billion.

In August 2007 he was listed as No. 577 on the list of the world's billionaires in Forbes magazine.

Trampolinist wins silver at world championships

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Samantha Sendel chose an opportune time to deliver a personal best performance when she soared to a silver medal finish at the recent World Age Group Gymnastics championships in Quebec City.

The 16-year-old trampolinist, competing in the province of her birth in front of her mother and grandmother, came through with a score of 35.5, while facing the highest degree of difficulty at 13.6 of any female competitor under 19. A native of Dollard-des-Ormeaux, Sendel's second-place finish came in the individual trampoline under-17 event, entering the final round as the last Canadian hope for a medal.

"I just wanted to do my routines as well as I could," she said of her performance, reminiscent of a silver medal-winning effort at the World Age Group Championships four years ago in Germany. "I felt a bit more pressure [being at home], but everyone was really supportive so that takes a bit of the pressure off as well."

She pulled off a triple front flip, known as a Triffus, in posting a score that would have also resulted in a second-place finish in the under 19 category.

At the last competition two years ago, nobody from Canada finished in the top six.

"Once you get to a certain level of difficulty, she is much more brave than most kids and that has helped her learn advanced skills," said coach Dave Ross, who trains Sendel, as well as the Canadian national team at Skyriders in Richmond Hill. "She's got confidence in her ability and her scores are already number four in Canada."

The Aurora resident credits her success to a lot of hard work. She does her routines every day, practicing all the skills five to six times a week, while exercising at the gym up to 10 hours weekly.

For good luck, Sendel takes her giant gorilla slippers and a gold medal from the 2002 Ontario Winter Games on the road to competitions. The slippers were a gift from Dad four years ago, while the medal came in a team trampoline event.

While still too young to compete at the senior level internationally, Sendel is targeting the 2012 Olympic Games in London, England as a long-term goal. She expects to begin training as a member of the senior Canadian team sometime in the new year, but is not eligible to participate at next summer's Olympics in Beijing.

"It's a dream of mine to go to the Olympics," she said. "Hopefully, all goes well."

A common obsession

By MICHAEL GORDON

I am sure that many people seeing the headline of this column will think it is referring to a mental disorder. For those who have faced the challenges of constipation, it sometimes can seem like a mental disorder – a fixation and obsessions with one's "movements."

Bowel movements often come into play, either as a primary or at least a secondary issue in a geriatric medical assessment. There is a tendency to ignore the problem of constipation, trivialize it or accept it as "normal with age."

People try a whole range of medications and "natural" products to achieve the goal of an easy-to-expel, well-formed bowel movement.

The food industry has recognized the size of the market for such products and created the "regularity" industry. Thus products are sold by happy-faced models who pick up boxes of cereals with looks of satisfaction on their faces.

When I was a medical student in Dundee, Scotland, I sat through a masterful presentation by the famous physician Denis Burkett, who spent many years in Africa studying, among other subjects, the dietary habits and their effects on the bowel movements of indigenous peoples.

Burkett showed us a photograph of a white missionary standing next to a native, each behind his most recent bowel movement. That of the missionary was a few pellet-sized droppings and that of the native was a mound that went above his ankles. Burkett said, "The missionary produced this after an hour of pushing and squeezing: the local tribesman, in two minutes with no effort at all." The class howled in laughter, but the message was not lost on any of us.

Most people have at some time experienced difficulty with regularity, perhaps following a prolonged trip, a change in diet or the use of certain medications that have constipating side effects.

Some people have, all their lives, been excessively concerned about their bowel movements. Some may have had a parent or grandparent who was fixated on regularity as a physiological necessity and who plied them with laxatives, sometimes in the form of daily castor oil – a potent bowel stimulant. Parents may have added milk of magnesia or senna products to their children's diet on a daily basis.

As adults, these people often suffer from the unfulfilled quest for the satisfying bowel movement and go from one doctor to another, being tested and treated with multiple products, including herbal supplements and "natural" products. Patients have shown me the "magical natural tea" from Europe, which contains the potent laxative senna.

Some people are unaware that certain medications may cause constipation. They include medications used for urinary symptoms and mood disorders, some over-the-counter medications for respiratory symptoms, and codeine products.

An inadequate amount of fibre (also called roughage) in our diets may also cause constipation. The main sources of fibre for Canadians are whole grain products, such as breads and cereals, and fruits and vegetables.

One of my favourite "tricks," which I learned years ago and recommend to my patients with regularity problems, is to eat oatmeal (not the instant type) in the mornings. Add a few tablespoons of Red River cereal to it before cooking (it can be prepared in a microwave). Red River cereal contains flax, among other grains.

Oatmeal promotes regularity, and it tastes good, too, when fruit and/or yogurt are added to it. With some luck, it will work for you.

EGGPLANT CANNELLONI

Ingredients

- 1 tbsp olive oil
- 4 lg shallots, sliced
- cooking spray
- 4 cloves garlic
- 2 jars (12 oz. each) roasted red peppers
- Juice of 1 orange (about 1/2 cup)
- 2 medium eggplants, cut lengthwise into 1/2" slices
- 4 oz. goat cheese
- 1 tsp capers, chopped (optional)
- 2 tbs chopped fresh parsley

Directions

Heat oil in skillet over medium heat. Cook shallots and garlic about 1 min. Reduce heat. Cook until golden, 3-5 min. Add peppers and juice; bring to a boil. Lower heat; simmer until peppers are soft, about 5 min. Cool. Puree mixture in blender. Pour into 9" x 13" baking dish; set aside. Coat eggplant slices with cooking spray; broil on baking sheet until golden on both sides, about 15 min. Heat oven to 400°F. Mash cheese, capers, 1 tbsp. parsley in a bowl. Place 1 tbsp. filling at end of each eggplant slice; roll up. Lay seam side down in baking dish. Bake 10-15 min. Top with remaining 1 tablespoon parsley.

Assimilation and tradition: a fine line

Epi on Education

In my last article, influenced as it was by the Chanukah season, I dealt with the significance of our advertising the miracle throughout the ages and around the world. That aspect of the celebration, which is directed outward to the larger population, is an announcement of our love of freedom.

The high value we place on our own specific heritage, and our desire to live at peace with our majority culture neighbours.

There is, however, another educational message in both the origins of Chanukah and its ongoing celebration over the generations that illumines just how we managed (and still manage) to live and thrive (not merely survive) as a minority among overwhelming cultural, social, and religious majorities, Christian or Islamic. The Hasmonian revolt was the beginning of our learning how to find the delicate balance between integration and assimilation.

The metaphor I have always used with my students has been that of eating an apple. We recite a blessing and start eating a fruit in full knowledge that our taste buds will be satisfied with the crisp and tangy taste of a fresh McIntosh, but also that part of the apple will stay with us to nourish our system for maintenance and growth, while another will be expelled as waste.

The lesson is clear. Transforming Jerusalem into a Greek polis was out of the question for the traditionalists who cared deeply about the Temple rituals and the values behind them. And yet, we came to live within Hellenistic society and adopt much of their culture and language. Did we not have two perfectly good words for a court in Hebrew (bet din and bet mishpat) when we named our court the Sanhedrin from the Greek sunedrion? Why did we label a heretic an "apikoros," from the Greek Epicurus, if the Greek language was not "tasty in our mouths?"

Across the centuries and wherever we have lived as Jews, we have managed to interact in such a fashion that language, music, literature, cuisine, and all the components of a culture flowed freely back and forth between us and our neighbours while we carefully drew the line between integration and total assimilation, rejecting that which could harm us and embracing that which appealed and allowed us to flourish.

"Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

– Book of Ruth (Judaism's first convert)

Why would a person choose Judaism?

What does a person converting from Christianity do with his or her belief in Jesus? Are Jews from birth really accepting of converts? The following is from an interview I conducted with Torontonian Bruce Cowley, who was born a Baptist and five years into his marriage, having already had children, decided to study Judaism, go to the mikvah, undergo a brit milah and stand before a bet din. Why? Because he wanted to be a Jew.

URBAN WRITER

riage. I did it for the right reasons.

I didn't want to be a passive parent who says to my children, about Judaism, "Go talk to your mom." I wanted to engage with my children. I wanted to learn, to be informed so I could talk to them. Rabbi Reuven Bulka, from Ottawa, said, "Take a conversion course." I did.

Prior to my conversion, Linda's parents weren't pleased that we were a couple. Her father encouraged us to live together, hoping we would break up. We didn't. They really are wonderful people though – her father is very smart, supportive and a great guy. Once they got to know me, they realized I was a good person.

My parents – who live in Calgary – they were a little quieter. My marrying a Jewish woman was not their fantasy, but they had been prepared because my oldest sister married a French Canadian Catholic and my other sister married an Irish Catholic. It was a bigger deal to them when my sister married the Irish Catholic than when I married a Jew. Linda and I were married on Oct. 29, 1988.

I was raised in a relatively conservative Baptist home. It was not evangelical. I draw parallels between my parents and a good Jewish home, because they lived their beliefs. My parents were always taking people in – you know, troubled people. They stressed tolerance. My father never said anything negative about anyone based on their religion, language or anything. Being a Baptist provided me with respect.

The fact that I was brought up in a good Christian home allowed my eyes to be opened to the positive stuff. When I was first exposed to Judaism, I think it was that kind of tolerance that allowed me to embrace Judaism.

When I finally converted it wasn't like I was struck by lightning – you know, like all of a sudden, I went to the mikvah, had a circumcision and stood before the bet din, and I was a Jew. It was gradual.

Circumcision? There was a urologist and some serious guys in the room davening. I was already Jewish in my mind, so I was happy to do it. I wanted to do it. It's a mitzvah. A while later, I called in to a CBC show and assured the (circumcision) naysayers that it does not affect your sensitivity in the slightest.

I think Judaism is a model for living. It provides a set of moral guidelines for me and my family. It's a model of goodness, one that human beings can live by and feel comfortable with. When I'm faced with a decision I try to find a reference point. I ask what is a good Jew supposed to do. You have to find your reference point and for me it's Judaism. I bounce everything off it.

"How do other Jews treat me?" Read part 2 next week for Bruce's response.)

My conversion on May 13, 1995, was very natural and it all felt right for me. I always said I wouldn't convert for mar-

Give or take 100 billion neurons, this tiny roundworm is really a slimmed-down model of the human nervous system.

Having such a simple nervous system makes C. elegans an ideal organism to study. Investigating its nervous system lets us draw important insights to the development and function of the human brain and spinal cord.

That's why researchers at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute of Mount Sinai Hospital often turn to C. elegans to study early development, neurobiology and the aging process.

Like Dr. Mei Zhen, who was able to show that, despite the vast differences in complexity, humans and this little worm are likely to use similar sets of genes to connect nerve cells.

Her accomplishment provided an important tool for researchers worldwide to study the human brain and how it develops. This promises new hope for the understanding and treatment of a vast range of psychiatric diseases from schizophrenia, depression and bi-polar disorder to neurodegenerative diseases like ALS and Alzheimer's.

Another scientist at Mount Sinai Hospital, Dr. Joseph Culotti, is using C. elegans in hopes of finding new ways to repair an injured spinal cord.

For his contribution to the advancement of world-leading spinal cord research, he was named the 2005 recipient of the Barbara Turnbull Award for Spinal Cord Research.

Dr. Culotti discovered startling similarities between the growth of this worm's neurons and those in the human spinal cord. By understanding the development of the spinal cord we may ultimately be able to replicate it – even enabling severed neurons to reconnect and repair the injured cord.

These advances in understanding underline that with a researcher's vision, remarkable insights can come from simple organisms, like a roundworm.

Zaide and the Boys

Guest Voice

In Israel, it's certainly common to see young men travelling around the country in groups, on their own or with their girlfriends, but how often do you come across two gorgeous single guys travelling with their grandfather?

Amidst the vast array of mid-lifers and senior citizens on Beit Halochem Canada's recent mission to Israel, cousins Jared Green, 29, and Dan Baum, 23, and their grandfather, Sidney Wolbrom, 91, inspired the rest of us with their genuine affection and mutual love for one another.

Wolbrom looks like any typical zaide you've seen hanging out at Bagel World or exercising at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre; balding, warm eyes, thick eyeglasses, a hearing aid in each ear and a physique as strong as an ox. So strong in fact, that he claims the one and only time he had a massage, the masseuse couldn't finish massaging him, for fear that he would "break her fingers."

Wolbrom is sharper than most of us and has an affinity for dates, events and exact prices of items he purchased more than 60 years ago. He sneezes at least three to four times after every meal, which he believes aids with his digestion, and does not smoke or drink. Wolbrom is a non-sense man who eats almost everything, doesn't wear suntan lotion and uses Aqua Velva (a brand of aftershave) to cure any ailment.

Whether walking side by side with their arms draped over their zaide's shoulders or beaming at him while listening to stories about the old days, Jared and Dan savoured each moment with their beloved grandfather. From morning till night Wolbrom, Jared and Dan moved as one unit. Every morning he woke his grandsons by tickling their feet, and every night Jared and Dan were sure to tuck their zaide into bed. Zaide and the Boys (as we coined them) were an unbeatable team ready for whatever the day would hold. Lunch or dinner, Jared and Dan enjoyed teasing their zaide, hoping to squeeze out another laugh or story from him. He would pretend to be annoyed, but within seconds, he would smile and dominate the conversation.

During these precious spontaneous moments, I had the pleasure and privilege of learning more about Sidney Wolbrom, the man who managed to sneak out twice from the concentration camp lineups.

Born on March 10, 1916, in Busko-Zdroj, Poland, Shea Wolbromski (Wolbrom) was the second youngest of 11 children. At 23, he escaped from Poland to Russia with his younger brother, where he survived by selling odds and ends on the black market. Tragically, his mother, Esther, and seven of his siblings perished at Treblinka. In Russia, he met the love of his life, Blima (Blanche), who had typhus at the time. He married her one month after they met.

After the war, Wolbrom went to Germany, where his three daughters, Rose and the twins Molline and Estelle, were born. With only $300 in his pocket, he and his wife and their three daughters moved to New York, where he worked in his brother's store for a while and then later opened a wholesale egg business. In 1966, he moved his family to Toronto, where he worked as a residential developer. He still drives himself in his beige Cadillac to his Brampton, Ont., office, four days a week.

I admit that by the end of the mission, I was completely smitten by Wolbrom and for good reason. Never have I seen such love openly showered on a grandparent before. It was Zaide's idea to go to Israel on the Beit Halochem mission. He and his friends donate their weekly poker profits to Beit Halochem Canada, and when Wolbrom received the mission notice, he just couldn't say no.

In fact, his connection to Israel is an enduring one. He and Blanche took each of their six grandchildren to Israel in honour of their bar or bat mitzvahs.

Community in desperate need of foster families

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish Family & Child is desperately seeking Jewish families to take in foster children, says Sheryl Ederman, a supervisor in child-care services.

"We have a crisis in terms of Jewish kids needing homes," she said.

The agency currently has 35 foster families in the Greater Toronto Area, but that is not enough to provide temporary shelter to all the Jewish children coming to care, she said.

They are looking for families "of all kinds. We need families who are great with toddlers or teenagers, and families who are great with special needs kids."

"We need weekend families, holiday families, families who will open their homes on Shabbat, and general respite families. This means if a family can give only two weekends a month, then we may have a need for a child who requires respite from another foster home on a regular basis."

"We need people — they can be single or single parents, and stay-at-home or working — who have an open heart and the ability to care for kids. They have to be kind and caring, but they do not have to have previous training; we provide families with a training program."

Kids come from all parts of the community, Ederman said, so they are looking for prospective parents from a variety of backgrounds.

She said that their families struggle with, among other things, stress, poverty, addiction or mental health problems, and when children come into the agency's care, there are serious concerns about their safety and protection. "Once [they are] in our care, every effort is made to return children to their own families."

The agency once received a call from a hospital, Ederman said, because a mother was admitted with depression, and there was no one at home for her 11-year-old daughter. "We placed the girl in a foster home until the mother was discharged and we made plans for the girl's safety. The girl still has contact with her foster family for occasional ongoing support."

A nine-year-old boy who had been in their care had been left home alone day after day while his parents worked.

"They left food on the table, and the child was responsible for getting himself up, eating and going to school. There was no emergency number available, and the child was minimally able to manage in an emergency situation. He was placed in a foster home until an assessment was made, and safety plans were developed to protect the child."

An emergency situation arose recently, Ederman said, when a child in foster care left the home because she was unhappy there. "We need to keep her in the Jewish community, but we don't have another home for her. If we had more resources, we could service the child better."

Her biological mother brought the girl in, she said, and they made arrangements to put temporary extra support in the foster home while the girl is awake. "We're not sure what the next step is. We can't leave the child with her mother and we have no more resources. We'd love to have a list of foster families, but we don't have one."

Howard Hurwitz, director of children's services, said kids come into care because, for all kinds of reasons, they can't live at home. "We have kids with a range of needs, and we try to pair children with more needs with a family who can handle them."

"Our goal is to have foster homes in every area of the city. We try hard to keep kids in their own community so they can continue in their local school, synagogue or community centre."

As a result of the crisis, he said, they have kids living in group homes outside of their own communities. "I hate to see that happen because it uproots a Jewish child from the Jewish community. They live with non-Jewish caregivers and have non-Jewish friends."

Truth, we were always taught and have grown up to believe, will always bear directly and positively upon consequences. Honesty will always be its own reward.

But not, alas, with respect to Israel. In its conflict with the Palestinians, the Jewish state has been painted in massively dark strokes as colonizer and as oppressor.

The truth has had very little bearing upon Israel's image around the world. One of the most egregious recent examples of this occurred in 2004 when Palestinians falsely accused Israel of perpetrating a massacre in Jenin. Media outlets parroted the Palestinian calumny and despite the truth which proved incontrovertibly that no massacre had taken place, it stuck.

A group of researchers at Hebrew University last week released a report that Israel's image actually worsened in the international media after its unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four communities in the West Bank in the summer of 2005.

According to the Jerusalem Post the researchers found that Israel was cast in a more negative light in both the United States and England after the Gaza withdrawal, compared to the period that preceded it, and that the improvement in Israel's image occurred fleetingly only during the actual disengagement itself.

"Israel continues to be viewed by the world as a conquering state," said Hebrew University political scientist Tamir Sheafer, who carried out the study. "We also found that the demands from Israel for territorial concessions in the territories not only were not lessened following the disengagement, but actually became stronger."

According to the Post, the study was based on thousands of online articles that appeared in British and American media, as well as on statements on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict by American and British leaders.

These findings are counter-intuitive, to say the least. And, it must be added, they are deeply disappointing. For if the wholesale pullout and painful uprooting of some 9,000 Jews from their communities in Gaza did not inspire decisively positive feelings towards the Jewish state, what, one worries to ask, would?

Canadians will recall that the coverage of the Second Lebanon War became obsessively, almost exclusively, focused on images of Lebanese families fleeing their homes and seeking refuge. The media virtually ignored the daily, deadly havoc wrought by the Katyusha rockets deliberately launched at civilian populations in northern Israel. They were only Katyushas, after all, and not crusades.

In the conflict with Israel, the Palestinians have perfected the image of victims. It is their permanent neon-glowing persona. It flashes their victimization throughout the world, a kind of directional beacon in a blind man's bluff. The image has been skillfully cultivated over the years and impressed upon most of the world untainted by any actions and behaviours of Palestinian leaders.

For example, the IDF recently found in a truck crossing from the West Bank and headed to Gaza, some 6.5 tons of potassium nitrate, a chemical used in the manufacture of explosives, hidden in a number of sacks marked as sugar, humanitarian aid from the European Union to the Palestinians. (See the photo inset.) The EU dutifully condemned what it called an "abuse of humanitarian aid."

The discovery of the potassium nitrate, along with discoveries of pipe bombs in baby carriages, weapons in ambulances, suicide belts wrapped around children and bomb parts in the undergarments of pregnant women, prove the need if not always the efficacy of checkpoint searches by the IDF. The searches mightily inconvenienced the individuals being searched; but they happen also to save lives.

Greater Toronto Area

An image undeserved

Should the harsh image fall upon the state that tries to save the lives of its people, or upon the Palestinian leaders who, cynically and cruelly, steadily and stealthily, send forth the weapons of destruction and death?

Last Thursday, Palestinians fired 25 mortar shells, six Qassam rockets and one Grad Katyusha rocket into Israel from Gaza. Israel of course retaliated.

In one of the incidents armed Palestinian gunmen entrenched themselves in a house in the southern Gaza Strip. From inside the house, using anti-tank missiles and small-arms, they fired upon Israeli soldiers. The soldiers responded with tank fire. They killed two armed gunmen and also, unfortunately, two Palestinian women who were in the house at the time.

The deaths of the two women were deeply regretted by the IDF.

The army published a statement to that effect but also emphatically stated that "the responsibility for the death of the Palestinian women lies with the gunmen, who operated intentionally from a civilian environment."

Should the harsh image fall upon the state that, in defence of the lives of its citizens unintentionally harms Palestinian civilians or upon the Palestinian leaders who, cynically and cruelly, steadily and stealthily, put their own people in deadly harm's way?

We all know that the question would not be asked were it in relation to any other country other than Israel.

Ivan Simon does not seem like your average "crunchy granola" type. A 40-something computer software architect living in Toronto with his wife and two children, he seems more like a supermarket kind of guy than a local organic consumer.

But Simon is one example of the growing trend to people changing the way they think about their food choices and where their food comes from. A passion for a healthier and more ecologically responsible lifestyle has motivated him to spearhead a Community Supported Agriculture organic farming program at Toronto's Beth Radom Congregation.

The Community Supported Agriculture (CSA) program

links local Ontario organic farms directly with consumers through the availability of fresh vegetable and fruit boxes. Beth Radom's program will see households purchase, in early spring, subscription "shares" of the year's harvest from a local organic farm. Participants pay for their produce at the beginning of the season to help provide the necessary start-up capital for farmers to purchase seeds and supplies.

Working in conjunction with Torat HaTeva, the Jewish Nature Centre of Canada, Simon says his goal in introducing the CSA program to Beth Radom is to make local, organic produce accessible, affordable and convenient for the Jewish community.

Michael Schechter of Torat HaTeva says his organization "recognizes there is a disconnect in the community between the environment and Judaism, and is working to repair it. So much of kashrut and Judaism is about healthy living and eating.

Zionism started with our attachment to the land. It was [David] Ben-Gurion's vision. Eating organic and making ecologically responsible choices helps us, as Jews, rekindle that."

Simon says his interest in rekindling this relationship was piqued when the shul's Cantor David Rosen delivered a Shabbat sermon about the environment. Simon was familiar with the CSA program through friends at the First Narayever Congregation in downtown Toronto, which hosts the only other Jewish CSA depot in Toronto. He approached Rosen with the idea of starting a program at Beth Radom.

Both men feel that the membership of Beth Radom, which is increasingly becoming a younger, family-oriented group, would react favourably to an environmental initiative such as CSA.

Simon also believes that one of a synagogue's roles is to be proactive. "I want this for Beth Radom and for our members. I hope that this program will motivate current members to become more active in the shul and within the Jewish community, and perhaps even attract new members."

Beth Radom and Torat HaTeva will work with the Plan B Organic Farm, a certified organic CSA farm in Southern Ontario, to provide the program. From June through the end of October, fruits and vegetables will be available to those who sign up as shareholders. In addition to the produce, kosher organic fish and chicken will be available this year.

Plan B is aware of kashrut concerns. For example, none of the vegetables or fruits supplied will be from farms that raise pork to avoid contamination through soil. While vegetables won't be checked for insects, observant clients may ask that their boxes exclude certain types of vegetables.

"People are realizing that the food we eat today is not the same — in taste, appearance, or in nutrients — as the food we grew up with," Simon says. "Organic produce tastes like farm food should taste."

Schechter adds that "when you think of the chemicals and pesticides used on crops, and the often inhumane treatment of animals used in mass-production farming, you have to ask yourself if that is following the spirit of kashrut."

Food boxes come in a variety of sizes. A half-share box, suitable for a household of two or three adults for example, contains eight to 10 assorted in-season items. Fresh herbs and a newsletter containing recipes and tips are also included. Boxes will be available for pickup once a week at the Beth Radom depot in the Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue area. The congregation is currently investigating a depot location in Thornhill.

Beth Radom will also practise tikkun olam by donating any unclaimed boxes each week to shelters and food recovery programs such as Second Harvest. Shareholders may also choose to donate a portion of their box to these causes directly.

Schechter will explain the principles and philosophy behind Community Supported Agriculture at a pre-Tu b'Shvat shiur at Beth Radom on Jan. 19 during morning services. Members of the community are welcome to attend and to participate in the CSA program. For more information, call the synagogue office at 416-636-3451, extension 24.

Torat HaTeva will hold a CSA Tu b'Shvat seder, also on Jan. 19, at the Anshei Minsk Synagogue. For information, visit <http://www.torathateva.org>.

Condemn incitement

Two off-duty soldiers of the Israel Defence Forces, Cpl. Ahikam Amihai (20) and Sgt. David Ruben (21), both from Kiryat Arba, were killed two weeks ago as they and a friend were hiking in the rugged, scenic hills near their home. Four Palestinians burst upon them and opened fire.

Islamic Jihad immediately claimed credit for the attack. But when the attackers were apprehended, it became known that one of them was employed by the security services of Mahmoud Abbas' Palestinian Authority (PA). This latter fact merely added to the anguish of the murder of the two young men. For, in an effort to help Abbas thwart Hamas' designs in the West Bank, and at the considerable urging of the American administration, Israel has been attempting to bolster the fighting capability of the PA police.

So deep was the bitterness and the resentment that the Kiryat Arba Local Council effectively accused the Israeli government of being a party to the murders: "Whoever sets terrorists free and gives them arms does not have to pull the trigger to be an accomplice," the council said in a release after the killings.

Some days later, at a conference in Tel Aviv comprised mainly of rabbis opposed to territorial compromise, the sentiments of the Kiryat Arba council were reiterated but in more ominous and more frightening terms. "The terrible traitor, (Prime Minister) Ehud Olmert, who gives these Nazis weapons, who gives money, who frees their murderous terrorists...collaborates with the Nazis," Rabbi Shalom Dov Wolpe told the audience. He then added: "[Olmert's punishment], and the punishment of [Vice Premier] Haim Ramon, and the punishment of [Foreign Minister] Tzipi Livni, and all these people, like [Defence Minister] Ehud Barak, should be to hang from the gallows."

Such language is outrageous. We abhor it. It must be rejected at every turn. However deep his differences with the decision-makers in the government of Israel, Rabbi Wolpe's language has no place in the discourse that surrounds the difficult decisions that lie ahead.

We therefore commend with high praise the statement last week by President Stephen J. Savitsky and Executive Vice President Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, in response to Wolpe's remarks.

"We unequivocally condemn Rabbi Wolpe's statements. They are beyond the pale of legitimate democratic protest and have no basis in Jewish law or hashkafa (philosophy). While we - and many other supporters of the State of Israel - often find ourselves in disagreement with the Government of Israel on certain policy matters, it is unconscionable to cross the line into hate, violence and threats. Debate and dissent must be conducted civilly and respectfully in accordance with our Torah, whose 'ways are the ways of pleasantness, and all of whose pathways are of peace.' We call upon all God-fearing Jews to act in a manner that brings praise to God, his People, Land and Torah."

We have all been to the dark, nation-rendering, soul-destroying, harmful place where Rabbi Wolpe's words inevitably lead. We must never, ever go there again. Woe to us if we do.

Response to Hart

I would like to comment on the column written by Lawrence Hart, "Time to reclaim our campuses," (CJN, Dec. 20). As a Jewish professional who works on the university campuses in Toronto, I feel I should speak out against those who wish to turn the campus environment into a battleground, playing out the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. And this goes for both sides of the debate.

Hart comments that those who advocate for dialogue on campus do so wrongly because dialogue with anti-Israel activists is a "futile exercise." I would agree wholeheartedly; however, Hille's dialogue building has never targeted this group. Instead we look to the large majority of students who are uninformed or undecided, those who believe that both sides are to blame, and the moderates.

Anti-Israel activists make arguments about lack of rights; we engage students with a table displaying information about the many rights that exist for Arab Israelis, for women, for gays and lesbians. Anti-Israel activists espouse divestment campaigns; we ensure that the broader student body knows about the many things Israel has to offer the world in various areas such as the many medical and technological advances. These are but a few examples of dialogue building.

And if you still don't believe me, then sit with me when we are at a table in Van Hall at York University with the video game Peacemaker and witness the hundreds of students who come up to us and thank us for the very type of programming that Hart criticizes, while condemning those programs that incite hatred.

Supreme Court's decision on get case

The Supreme Court of Canada recently decided that a husband would be liable for damages for breaking his agreement to the court that he would give his wife a get as part of his civil divorce ("Damages upheld for denied get," CJN, Dec. 20). This decision holds three important lessons for our community.

- 1) Religious freedom is a basic right in our society - but it is not an unlimited right. It is not acceptable (civilly or Jewishly) to hurt another person or to renege on a promise and claim religious freedom to rationalize your behaviour. Those who protest the reasonable accommodation of minorities, claiming that basic human rights may be trampled, should rest easy knowing that the Supreme Court will not allow outrageous and offensive behaviour under the guise of religious freedom.
- 2) A get is not a weapon. Once a Jewish couple decides their marriage must end, it is required by Jewish law that the husband agree to give and the wife agree to accept a get. It is never acceptable to use the get to extort the other spouse for money, for custody, or for vindictive anger. All legitimate pressure must be used to dissuade an angry, stubborn spouse from abusing others by refusing a get.

3) The best way to prevent the terrible situation of agunah is with a prenuptial agreement that creates a valid, binding contract to follow the advice of a beit din in case the marriage irreparably fails. In the case of a couple already married, a post-nuptial agreement can be executed.

I call upon my colleagues throughout Canada to require this document before they will officiate at any wedding ceremony. I also urge every Jewish person considering marriage to require of their officiating rabbi the execution of such a document.

Survivor memoirs

In "Azrieli Foundation launches survivor memoir series," (CJN, Dec. 6), it was stated that in the past the memoirs of survivors had usually been recorded in the form of interviews that "remain in archives or libraries and are only seen, read or heard by students and scholars, not the general public."

In 2001, the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, began publishing memoirs of survivors. To date, we have published 12 books that we have distributed to 50 libraries and Holocaust centres worldwide. Eight of the memoirs are in Polish, three in English, and one in both languages. We welcome the contribution of additional memoirs. Not being a foundation of great financial means, we are unable to widely publicize the work we are doing.

Obama has sought Jewish support throughout career

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

Ask about Barack Obama's natural constituencies and you might hear that he's the first black with a viable shot at the White House; or about his Kenyan father and his childhood in Indonesia; or the youthfulness of his followers; or the millions of Oprah junkies swooning over his candidacy.

What you might not hear is that the Illinois senator, who made history last Thursday by winning the Democratic caucus in Iowa, has made Jewish leaders an early stop at every stage in his political career.

In his first run for the Illinois Senate in 1996, he sought the backing of Alan Solow, a top Chicago lawyer. Eight years later, running for the U.S. Senate – long before he became the shoo-in, when he was running in a Democratic field packed with a dozen candidates, including some Jews – one of his first meetings was with Robert Schrayner, a top Jewish philanthropist in Chicago.

When he launched his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination in late 2006, he named as his fund-raising chief Alan Solomon, the Boston Jewish philanthropist who helped shepherd Senator John Kerry to the Democratic candidacy in 2004.

And he chose a gathering of the pro-Israel lobby, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), last March to deliver his presidential candidacy's first foreign policy speech.

"Some of my earliest and most ardent supporters came from the Jewish community in Chicago," Obama told JTA in 2004, after his keynote speech galvanized the Democratic convention in Boston.

Three years later, addressing the National Jewish Democratic Council's candidate's forum, he made the same point when he was asked about his ties with Arab Americans and Muslim Americans in Chicago.

"My support within the Jewish community has been much more significant than my support within the Muslim community," Obama said at the April forum, adding: "I welcome and seek the support of the Muslim and Arab communities."

His Jewish followers are fervent, distributing "Obama '08" yarmulkes early in his campaign.

His rock-star status as well as the relationships Obama has built in the community have helped avoid murmurings of his otherwise notable divergences from pro-Israel orthodoxies.

In his AIPAC speech, for example, Obama favoured diplomacy as a means of confronting Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program. "While we should take no option, including military action, off the table, sustained and aggressive diplomacy combined with tough sanctions should be our primary means to prevent Iran from building nuclear weapons," he said.

Barack Obama

AIPAC does not oppose diplomacy in engaging Iran, but dislikes it as an emphasis, believing that talks could buy the Iranian regime bomb-making time. But his words did not stop the Chicago hotel ballroom packed with 800 AIPAC members from cheering Obama on.

A few weeks later, Obama drew more rubberneckers than any other candidate attending AIPAC's policy forum in Washington – drawing away onlookers from Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, although she outpolls Obama among Jewish voters. No one to take risks with respect to its security. But it can ask Israel to say that it is still possible for us to allow more than just this status quo of fear, terror, division. That can't be our long-term aspiration."

Early in his campaign, he handily killed an Israel-related controversy in its early stages. At a chat he had said that "no one has suffered more than the Palestinians."

Blame the leadership was what he meant, he later explained: "What I said was, nobody has suffered more than the Palestinian people from the failure of the Palestinian leadership to recognize Israel, to renounce violence and to get serious about negotiating peace and security for the region," Obama said during an MSNBC debate.

Obama tempers his deviations from pro-Israel orthodoxy by going an extra mile in areas where he agrees with groups such as AIPAC.

He has led the effort in the Senate to pass legislation that would assist U.S. states that choose to divest from Israel. His top Middle East adviser is Dennis Ross, who had the job during the Clinton administration and who has since principally blamed the Palestinian leadership for the failure of the Oslo peace process.

And in recent speeches, Obama tweaked his pro-Israel rhetoric to echo the recent drive by the Israeli government and pro-Israel groups to insist on recognition of Israel as a Jewish state.

"I think everyone knows what the basic outlines of an agreement would look like," he said in a speech redistributed by his campaign. "It would mean that the Palestinians would have to reinterpret the notion of right of return in a way that would preserve Israel as a Jewish state. It might involve compensation and other concessions from the Israelis, but ultimately Israel is not going to give up its state."

On domestic issues, Obama is savvy about Jewish social justice commitments, and is on a first-name basis with two of the top Jewish religious lobbyists in Washington – Rabbi David Saperstein of the Reform movement and Nathan Diament, who represents the Orthodox Union.

But that connection is not enough to supplant Clinton among Jewish voters. In a recent American Jewish Committee poll, his favourable rating was 38 per cent, while hers was 53 per cent.

Clinton also has most of the Jewish congressional delegation backing her. Her years as first lady and as senator have made her a more familiar presence among Jews. Public policy groups are likelier to favour her uncompromising approach to pushing universal health care, as opposed to Obama's appeal to build consensus on the issue.

Obama's appeal is in his broader vision, according to Solomon.

"This election will be about change – a change in government and the way politics is conducted," he told JTA last May. "There is a connection between gridlock and the smallness of our politics."

Obama tweaked his pro-Israel rhetoric to echo the recent drive by the Israeli government and pro-Israel groups winned when he said that Palestinian needs must be considered in working out a peace deal, although that's hardly standard AIPAC pep talk.

He made the same point at the National Jewish Democratic Council event.

"It is in the interests of Israel to establish peace in the Middle East," he said. "It cannot be done at the price of compromising Israel's security, and the United States government and an Obama presidency cannot ask Israel

Opinions

Beware of 'para-Judaism'

A Jewish community in Europe I know well has, in place of a rabbi, a local neurologist as its "spiritual leader." His formal Jewish training is non-existent. His knowledge of Hebrew and Judaism seems to be very limited.

Rabbi Dov
Marmur
in Toronto

When I told the president of his congregation that I've always wanted to be a neurologist so that I could come and practise in his city, at least part time, the president was not amused. He was less tolerant of medical than of religious quacks.

Like many others, he assumed that you don't need rabbinic training as long as you show a measure of competence and confidence on the bimah. How often have I been told – "in jest," of course – by proud relatives of a bar or bat mitzvah who performed adequately that now my job was on the line and the child would soon take over.

It's the fact that the rabbinate is held in such low esteem that has made "spiritual leaders" a not uncommon phenomenon. Several congregations in Canada are served by them. These women and men may have been employed, as in the case of the aforementioned neurologist, because it's difficult to find properly trained rabbis. I surmise, however, that this is not the only reason. Congregations may also want them because it's easier to control them.

Trained rabbis tend to claim external authority both from tradition and from their professional bodies, which have standards that congregants are expected to respect. And because they have trained for at least five years – as much or more than other accredited professionals – their remuneration should be commensurate. By contrast, "spiritual leaders" ("para-rabbis" often addressed as "Rabbi") are frequently employed part time. They are both more pliable and less payable.

Sadly, learning and competence have ceased to be priorities in many congregations in favour of "spirituality" and "charisma." After all, gurus don't need to go to rabbinic school, and it's gurus that many congregations seem to want.

I'm all in favour of do-it-yourself Judaism. I know successful groups that function very well without "the benefit of clergy," because many of their members are sufficiently knowledgeable to conduct services and teach. They don't need to employ people to do it for them. I suspect, however, that this isn't the case in the communities that have "spiritual leaders." Though there is no way of assessing their knowledge, it's reasonable to assume that they know only a little more than those to whom they minister, and that's deemed to be sufficient.

The lack of competent religious leadership in a growing number of congregations all over the world is yet another manifestation of the dangers Diaspora Jewry is facing. The prevalence of "para-rabbis" may lead to "para-Judaism" in place of the real thing.

Being on a campus is like being in a constant search for an identity. We are all trying to figure out who we are and where we fit in the world.

This is even more the case for Jewish students. There is a sense on campus that there is no true Jewish community identity, something that unites us. Our lives are complicated by religion, tradition and Israel. We want to maintain some semblance of identity and at the same time, fit into larger campus life.

As a result, we spend an inordinate amount of time questioning ourselves and our own philosophies.

In the hyper-politicized campus world, it is easy to lose perspective and become bogged down in petty issues and emotionally charged hand-wringing that seem to define student life. After all, we are young and still maturing. It's impossible to have a complete world view when one is just entering the real world.

It almost feels as though we've engaged ourselves in a cyclical guessing game trying to determine our own identity, and, in the process, we've forgotten that we have one, an identity forged through thousands of years.

The act of not turning away a stranger at your door on Shabbat – that's what makes our community great and that's what makes our community strong. That is our identity. We are a great people who not only survive, but thrive and make our society great.

Mark Masters
in Ottawa

You walk around the campus of Carleton University. You pass the Minto Building and the Azrieli Theatre, two structures built thanks too the donations of Jewish community leaders. You walk and you wonder where the spirit is on campus.

The Jewish fraternity in Ottawa – my fraternity – has had a philanthropy chair each semester I have been involved with it, and every semester it has been an afterthought, a nuisance. It's rarely discussed at meetings and I cannot think of one truly successful philanthropy event we have run in my five years on campus.

The Canadian Federation of Jewish Students has a nearly impossible task of trying to unite a community with no shortage of opinions, spread across the country.

The best way to do that would be to have a nationwide Jewish philanthropy event. I'm not talking about money; instead imagine a joint effort coast to coast – not a single conference, but a charity push with an ambitious goal to strive for, not in terms of money, but rather of hours.

The greatest gift people can give is their time and their effort. In our community, we think it's about becoming stronger internally but there is a disagreement on how to achieve this. Do we build a big tent or focus on inspiring the small number of already mobilized students? The answer is to focus on things that unify people.

Consider this a call to action for Jewish student leaders to make philanthropy a key value this semester. Whether it be raising awareness of the genocide in Darfur, supporting cancer research or working to fight poverty, it's time to think big and reach out.

My fraternity is planning a Skate for the Cure event in support of breast cancer research, to take place on the Rideau Canal. Meanwhile, the Jewish Students' Association in Ottawa is planning a campaign to get the Carleton cafeteria to donate its excess food to those in need.

And while the association has no philanthropy position on its executive, the issue is usually discussed at meetings and it appears that it will have a more prominent position on the agenda next semester.

The foundation has already been laid.

The more I live, the more I realize that life is about so much more than the issues we drone on about day after day. Life is about being able to change someone else's life for the better. This should be our identity.

Sure, we have a political agenda – every community does – but we should be defined by what our core principle is, and that core principle is helping our society become stronger. If our community on campus embraces this, we will be stronger than ever internally and externally.

All we have to do is be true to our identity.

A call to action

It's harder to be proactive

Part of being an individual is the inherent need for self-definition. Likewise, for groups of people, there is the need to delineate boundaries and exact a definition to distinguish one group from another.

In this process, though, many people and groups fall victim to the pitfalls of negative definitions. It is far easier to assert what we are not than to avow what we are. It requires far less moral resolve to declare what we oppose than to affirm what we stand for. And it takes far less courage to decry others than to stand as ourselves. Following this logic, many people and groups remain reactionary, identifying themselves negatively rather than proactively undertaking a process of self-definition.

While much of society engages in such practices, they endanger the possibility of finding any independent identity. We are Canadian, meaning not American, and we are Jewish, meaning not gentile. However, if our individuality is dependent on an opposition to others, what happens when we are suddenly deprived of such an opposition? To put it more vividly, what happens when we become acculturated entirely into society and the separation between Jewish values and societal values shrinks? Do we, as Jews, lose our identity because it is dependent solely on such a differentiation? The Halifax Zionist student population has been put to such a test this year.

This is my third year at Dalhousie University. In my previous two years, there existed on campus a dedicated Palestinian student advocacy group. The group, known as the Palestinian Students Society (PSS), held events dealing with Middle East politics, human rights on the international stage and Palestinian culture. On several occasions, particularly contentious political issues – such as the separation wall and accusations of apartheid – have flared up. These issues, though, have been quickly resolved by the University.

Jesse Mintz
in Halifax

Despite this constant presence, Dalhousie has never been similar to Concordia in terms of animosity concerning the Middle East. Still, notwithstanding the relative harmony on Dalhousie campus, the regular PSS presence has typically provided an easy binary equation for the pro-Israel advocacy groups, both Jewish and non-Jewish in orientation.

The PSS would erect a wall as a demonstration – pro-Israel groups would educate about the safety benefits of the wall and the threats of suicide bombing; the PSS would bring in a speaker to repudiate the initial establishment of the State of Israel – pro-Israel students would attend the speech and refute the assertions; the PSS would organize a march to raise awareness of the supposed apartheid – pro-Israel students would concurrently educate students about the shared democratic values of Canada and Israel. The activity of the PSS provided a simple equation of us and them in which it was easy, and largely sufficient, to remain principally reactive.

This year, the PSS has almost entirely faded from the Dalhousie scene. The absence of a disparate student advocacy group has spoiled the previous binary interaction and has forced the pro-Israel groups on campus to become proactive. If before it was enough to merely stand opposed to the actions of the PSS, it has now become crucial for pro-Israel students and groups to spread their message proactively and independent of opposition.

This year has therefore witnessed an amplification of pro-Israel measures and events on campus, despite the lack of an organized opposition to play off. Without an antagonizing opposition, pro-Israel groups have been able to identify what specifically relates to the Dalhousie student population. Political issues have thus been largely relegated to the back burner while cultural topics have been stressed. Matters such as "shared values" have been brought to the fore – best exemplified by a very successful fundraiser recently held for the Israeli charity, Save a Child's Heart.

The truth is that many of us don't care to be proactive. Pro-Israel student groups could have faded from the Dalhousie scene this year. Used to being reactionary and without an organized political antagonist to oppose, it would have been very simple for them to allow the issue of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict to ebb from the student mind. It's easy to react to accusations of apartheid, an anti-Israel protest and a massive wall erected on campus; it's far harder to reinvent oneself to stand alone, without the crutch of an opposite, and advocate for oneself.

Halifax Zionist groups should be commended.

A cornucopia of books...

This eclectic selection of books, ushering in a new year, proves yet again that publishers are eager to please a diverse and demanding readership.

Israel rates Iran as its most deadly adversary and rival, but this was not the case before the 1979 Islamic revolution. In Treacherous Alliance: The Secret Dealings of Israel, Iran and the U.S. (Yale University Press), Iranian scholar Trita Parsi, having interviewed 130 decision-makers in Iran, Israel and the United States, carefully examines Israel's complicated relationship with Iran against the backdrop of Washington's convoluted ties with Tehran. Among his conclusions: Iran fears that an Israeli peace agreement with the Palestinians will leave it isolated, while Israel fears that an American rapprochement with Iran will hurt its interests.

Israel in History: The Jewish State in Comparative Perspective (Routledge), by University of Toronto scholar Derek Penslar, is a probing analysis of Israel's historical development. He asks tough, provocative questions in a bid to better understand the dualities and contradictions of Israeli society.

Victoria Clark's Allies for Armageddon: The Rise of Christian Zionism (Yale University Press) holds that this phenomenon, rooted in biblical prophecy, poses a real threat to Israel. Clark, a British journalist, argues that Christian fundamentalist support of Israel is predicated on a Second Coming of Christ philosophy in which two-thirds of Jews will perish and the rest will be converted.

Meron Benvenisti, a deputy mayor of Jerusalem from 1971 to 1978 and now a columnist for the Israeli daily Haaretz, offers personal ruminations of pre-state Jerusalem and Israel's early years in Son of the Cypress: Memories, Reflections, and Regrets from a Political Life (University of California Press).

Charles Glass, in The Tribes Triumphant (HarperCollins), offers an impressionistic survey of the region since the 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States.

Joe Sacco pumps up the Palestinian cause in an intense graphic novel, Palestine: The Special Edition (Fantagraphics Books), paying only lip service to Israel's case.

Aaron Aaronsohn, an intriguing figure in pre-state Israel, was a scientist, political oper-

Alfred Kazin, the son of barely literate Jewish immigrants, burst upon the U.S. literary scene in 1942 with On Native Grounds. Richard Cook's trenchant biography, Alfred Kazin (Yale University Press), will probably be the definitive work on this difficult and combative man.

Graphic Biography of Emma Goldman (The New Press), by Sharon Rudahl, recaps the career of a fiery anarchist through the medium of vigorous illustrations. The relationship between Gertrude Stein, the so-called high priestess of modernism, and her enigmatic companion and lover, Alice G. Toklas, is glist for Janet Malcolm's mill. In Two Lives: Gertrude and Alice (Yale University Press), she presents a portrait of the pair.

Jewish Communities on the Ohio River (University of Kentucky Press), by Amy Hill Shevitz, demonstrates how the westward movement of Jews in the United States from 1820 to 1920 influenced American culture and history.

Jonathan Elukin's study of Jewish-Christian relations during the Middle Ages, Living Together, Living Apart (Princeton University Press), challenges conventional wisdom. Rather than being an era of endless anti-Jewish persecution, he states, it was a pluralistic epoch in which Jews were allowed to feel part of their local communities, notwithstanding outbursts of overt anti-Semitism.

The Moscow Yiddish Theater (Yale University Press), by Benjamin Harshav, focuses on its role as a revolutionary vehicle of artistic expression in the Soviet Union from 1919 until its closure in 1948. Buchenwald inmates Henia and Ilona Karmel, in A Wall of Two (University of California Press), convey the terror of the times in poetry. Kopel Kolpanitzky, whose family was murdered in a Lithuanian ghetto, fought in a partisan unit and the Red Army before immigrating to Israel. His memoir, Sentenced to Life (Valentine Mitchell), is chilling yet hopeful. Two Flags: Return to the Warsaw Ghetto (Gefen), by Miriam Apfelbaum, is an analysis of one of the two organizations that planned the 1943 uprising, the Jewish Military Union, known as the ŻZW.

Jews for Judaism celebrates chai anniversary

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

It has been 18 years since counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism first opened its doors in Toronto, in response to the ever-growing problem of "Hebrew Christian" groups aggressively campaigning to convert Jews.

The chai anniversary is fitting, given Jews for Judaism's endeavours to bring people back to a Jewish life.

The office opened when Julius Ciss, the executive director, noticed the dearth of response to counter the missionary presence in Toronto. In 1982, he produced simple pamphlets and put ads in Jewish newspapers across Canada, as well as lecturing in synagogues.

Ciss, who was in the "Jews for Jesus" movement for a short time, had returned to Judaism and wanted to help others do so.

In 1989, the main branch of Jews for Judaism in Baltimore heard what Ciss was doing and asked him to join the organization. Eventually, Rabbi Michael Skobac, who is now the educational director, began working with Ciss.

The only Canadian office is in Toronto, but Ciss and Skobac also do speaking tours across Canada. They make themselves available for counselling sessions, relying on the Internet and long-distance calls to connect with out-of-city requests.

"We wish we could go out of business due to lack of business, but business is bigger than ever," says Ciss. Last year alone, he cites some 1,700 counselling sessions with Jewish victims of cults and missionaries. They fulfilled 2,600 requests for information, and more than 7,000 people attended their lectures. Jews for Judaism also distributed 90,000 free educational books and materials in 2007. They have the endorsement of Canadian Jewish Congress, United Jewish Appeal and other Jewish organizations across Canada.

Ciss says there are 120 groups specifically targeting Jews for conversion in Canada. Seven years ago, Toronto had 100 messianic churches, according to Ciss. Now there are 130 who campaign regularly and widely to convince Jews that Jesus is compatible with Judaism.

But it's not the only anniversary for the counter-missionary group. Ten years ago, around Chanukah, Jews for Judaism opened their Thornhill, Ont., office, next to a just-opened "Jews for Jesus"-type church. The house of worship uses Jewish symbols and iconography, and even some blessings in Hebrew, but its congregants believe in Jesus.

Jews for Judaism moved in as community members were outraged that the church had opened at the corner of Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue, a location where there was much Jewish activity – such as a Jewish youth organization, Jewish-Russian immigrant life and a kosher ice cream parlour – leaving many to believe the young and vulnerable were at risk.

As the Toronto office celebrates a milestone, a new office in Jerusalem run by a former "messianic Jew" has opened.

"A lot of Israelis believe in Christianity, and the 'Jews for Jesus' types blanket the country," says Ciss. A few years ago, he and Rabbi Skobac were on a speaking tour of Israel, and asked how many in one audience knew someone who is Jewish, but believes in Jesus. About a third of them raised their hands. "A shocking testament to the missionary problem," says Ciss.

This is compared to his empirical surveys in Canada and the United States, where he sees one-tenth, and a quarter, respectively, of the audience raise their hands to his question. One report says that about three-quarters of the new converts are Israeli or Russian.

"There is a spiritual weakness in that respect. They are susceptible," says Rabbi Skobac. "Outreach is needed not to protest the missionary's existence. But we want to try, lovingly, to help them realize that while we are in vehement opposition to what they're [the missionaries are] preaching, we desire dialogue to help them [Jews who have converted to Christianity] see the reality of the path they've chosen, and re-evaluate their Jewish commitment and bring their soul back to Judaism."

We take pride ... in your success.

The start of a new year is often a time for reflection and review. Looking back over 2007, it's impossible to not feel proud of the outstanding achievements of the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund (RMIF).

Investors from Jewish communities across Canada are entrusting their money to the Fund in record amounts. In December 2007 alone, the RMIF accepted new investments of over $11 million, with 92 existing investors increasing their investments in the Fund. This infusion of capital boosts the Fund's holdings to over $400 million.

While these figures are impressive in and of themselves, what's even more impressive is the underlying message: Investors have confidence in the Fund – in its proven performance, its solid results, and its strong management. It's largely this confidence – combined with the Fund's outstanding track record – that is responsible for the RMIF's ongoing success and growth. Our clients consistently recommend the Fund to their friends and family members, enabling the investor base to grow from within, through informed referrals from satisfied clients. Unlike investments available today through brokers and financial consultants, no fees or commissions are payable to anyone for referral to the RMIF.

This investor confidence is particularly remarkable given the continued instability and uncertainty in the marketplace. That's why investors looking for an investment with low volatility, predictable returns, and a regular monthly income stream are naturally attracted to the RMIF. Managed by Romspen Investment Corporation – a company with disciplined lending principles honed through decades of experience – the Fund provides financing for commercial real estate, 93% of which is secured by first mortgages. Since the Fund's inception, returns to investors are in the range of 10% per annum, payable on the 15th of every month.

Canadian prenatal multivitamins PregVit folic 5 and PregVit receive Kosher Certification

Duchesnay is the first and only pharmaceutical company in Canada to receive Kosher certification from the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) for its prescription prenatal multivitamins (PregVit folic 5 and PregVit). Therefore, Jewish women have now access to a family of prenatal vitamin and mineral supplements that comply with their religious belief and related food standards.

The following certification logo appears on both PregVit folic 5 and PregVit packages:

To be certified Kosher, the 27 active and inactive ingredients contained in PregVit folic 5 and PregVit have to comply with the requirements of the Jewish religious laws pertaining to food (all the ingredients contained in PregVit folic 5 and PregVit are vegetable base). Their manufacturing, packaging and handling processes must also meet the certification standards. To maintain certification, the PregVit folic 5 and PregVit manufacturing site is subject to periodic inspections from COR certification agency.

In addition, to meet the needs of thousands of women with coeliac disease or with lactose intolerance, Duchesnay has announced that PregVit folic 5 and PregVit do not contain gliadin-gluten, lactose or tartrazine.

About The Kashruth Council of Canada (COR)

The Kashruth Council of Canada, known by its trademark , has been in existence for more than 50 years and is one of the most recognized kashruth agencies in the world. COR, the largest kashruth agency in Canada, guides the observance of kosher dietary laws.

Today, more than 900 facilities, retail and commercial carry the  as a symbol of kashruth certification, over 45,000 products bear the  certification symbol. Their goal is to provide the highest level of kosher supervision using the latest scientific technology.

The objectives of the Kashruth Council of Canada are to promote the observance of Orthodox Judaism by ensuring the availability and identification of kosher products and in particular:

- to provide kashruth supervision and certification to all types of food service production and manufacturing businesses;
- to promote and encourage the production, distribution and use of kosher food products and services; and
- to promote awareness amongst consumers about the use of kosher products, the importance of such products in Jewish observance and to identify for consumers which products meet the traditional standards of kashruth.

About Duchesnay (www.duchesnay.com)

Based in Laval, Québec, Duchesnay is the first pharmaceutical company to dedicate itself exclusively to the pregnant women and their newborn, to ensure that expecting women who require pharmacological treatments for pre-existing or pregnancy-related diseases have access to proper counselling and to medications that are proven safe for them and offsprings.

Muslim world ignorant of Holocaust: Israeli scholar

By SHELTON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

Knowledge of the Holocaust is virtually non-existent in the Muslim world, says an Israeli scholar specializing in anti-Semitism. "The ignorance is rampant," declared Dina Porat, head of the Stephen Roth Institute for the Study of Contemporary Antisemitism and Racism at Tel Aviv University. "There is close to no knowledge about it."

As a result, she said in an interview, the president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, can deny the Holocaust with impunity, while television stations in Syria, Egypt and Lebanon can broadcast anti-Semitic historical dramas without so much as a local protest.

Yet the situation is not completely hopeless, noted Porat, who was in Toronto last month to attend an international conference of the Association of Jewish Studies.

Iranian reformist politicians recently lambasted Ahmadinejad's Holocaust denial as "political adventurism" detrimental to Iran's image.

And in Egypt, Osama El Baz, one of the late president Anwar Sadat's closest advisers, has attacked Holocaust denial, saying it puts all Arabs to shame.

Porat, a historian, acknowledged that the Arab-Israeli conflict exacerbates anti-Semitic feeling in Muslim nations.

"But this is not the basic reason for anti-Semitism," she noted, saying that anti-Americanism and opposition to globalization are the primary causes.

Porat, who has headed the Stephen Roth Institute for the past 15 years, claimed that anti-Semitism is more deeply entrenched among the estimated 20 million Muslims of Europe than in Muslim countries.

Many European Muslims are resentful at being relegated to the margins of society, she said.

"Not being able to integrate into European societies, they take out their frustration on Jews," she said an allusion to the phenomenon of Muslim attacks on Jews in France since the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising in 2000. "They perceive Jews as a privileged minority with a high standard of living."

When Islamophobia is on the ascendancy, anti-Semitism also rises. "We've begun studying this," she said.

These different kinds of hatred feed into each other by virtue of the belief, shared by some Europeans, that Jews were instrumental in liberalizing immigration laws and thus bringing greater number of Muslim immigrants to Europe.

Porat said that young Israeli Arabs are generally acquainted with the Holocaust, which is a mandatory part of their school curriculum. But even in Israel, the degree to which it is taught is left to teachers' discretion.

Turning to a related topic, she expressed surprise that a survey, commissioned recently by the Organization of European Security and Co-operation, concluded that Holocaust education does not necessarily diminish anti-Semitism.

"It's difficult to explain the Holocaust to students because there was no factual basis for it. There was no dispute between Germans and Jews. Since it was not logical to kill millions of Jews, it is hard to explain the Holocaust. So students ask: 'Why were Jews singled out? What's wrong with the Jews?'"

It is even possible that Holocaust education may cause resentment and a competition for victimhood, Porat added.

Yet Holocaust education remains an important tool for combating anti-Semitism and relaying basic information concerning Jewish history and culture and Judaism, she said.

Familiarity with the Holocaust, however, does not prevent criticism of Israel's policies, she observed.

In her judgment, Holocaust denial peaked in the period from the mid-1980s to the late 1990s.

It has since declined due to three factors: the Pope's visit to Yad Vashem – the Holocaust memorial/museum in Jerusalem – in 2000; the declaration by the United Nations classifying the liberation of Auschwitz in 1945 as an international memorial day, and the unsuccessful lawsuit brought by British Holocaust denier David Irving against American historian Deborah Lipstadt.

According to Porat, the centre of Holocaust denial today is the Institute for Historical Review, in Torrence, Calif.

Anti-Jewish conspiracy theories, generated by the destruction of the World Trade Towers on Sept. 11, 2001, by Arab terrorists, resonate more than seven years later, she said.

The theory that the Mossad – Israel's external security service – was behind the bombing of the twin towers is a cornerstone of anti-Semitic dogma, as is the claim that the Mossad warned Jews not to report to work there.

She does not believe that the recent spate of swastika daubings in Israel by Russian immigrants, some of whom are Christians, is a classic expression of anti-Semitism. "It's really a protest against a society that hasn't absorbed these immigrants."

Porat, who was born in Argentina and immigrated to Israel with her family in 1950 at the age of seven, said that anti-Semitism will always exist in one form or another. "Anti-Semitism is a problem for every generation." As a child in Buenos Aires, she had firsthand experiences with anti-Semitism. And while anti-Semitism has made her a cynic, she said she is not cynical in her relations with people.

A member of Yad Vashem's scientific committee, Porat has taught Jewish history at Tel Aviv University for the past 20 years. She has published several books, including The Blue and the Yellow Stars of David: The Zionist Leadership and the Holocaust, 1939-1945.

The Stephen Roth Institute for the Study of Contemporary Antisemitism and Racism, founded in 1991, sponsors multidisciplinary research projects and conferences and publishes studies and an annual survey of anti-Semitic incidents.

Former club members hold 50th anniversary reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER

Special to The CJN

Friendship and keeping in touch with old friends are very important, says Ken Heller.

"Looking back, those years were a wonderful time of life with less stress and a place to go every week to have fun."

Several months ago, Heller, 66, began planning a 50th anniversary reunion with the former members of Club Desmond, a club for teenage boys that met at the Bloor YM-YWHA some 50 years ago.

He and his longtime friend Ron Morris began to search.

"We couldn't locate several of them, but 19 former members and our adviser, Bill Laber, met recently for dinner to celebrate at our 50th reunion. One member, Michael Adler, even flew in from Florida."

Heller, who is in the printing business, describes the event as "phenomenal." He says that as the former members arrived, many of them who had not seen each other over the years "hugged and kissed each other and the mood was very happy. It was a time for schmoozing, reminiscing, viewing a collage of photos and passing around pictures which the former members brought with them."

In the 1950s, the Club Desmond met Thursday and Sunday evenings at the Y at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue, now the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Heller recalls that the dues were 25 cents a week. Their program included floor hockey, basketball, swimming, social dances and fundraising for the United Appeal.

"We were so proud to raise $125 at a dance," says Heller. "At the reunion, former members laughed, and one said that today, we go out for lunch for that amount."

The club was formed in 1954, when several friends were sitting around at the Palmerston Avenue home of brothers Abie and Sheldon Lovat and decided to form a new group.

"Sheldon and a couple of guys approached a bunch of guys who went to King Edward Public School and other schools in the area, and hence the new Club Desmond was born."

Heller has a signed contract with the Seaway Hotel dated in the mid-1950s for a dinner for 40 members and guests of Club Desmond. The price for a five-course meal was $3.75, which included recorded dance music and a coke and ginger ale bar.

In the 1960s, things began to change as some members moved north and others left after they became engaged and married. The club disbanded.

Following their 50th anniversary reunion, Heller received numerous e-mails from those who attended, expressing their appreciation, happiness and thanks for the "wonderful event."

"It rekindled my youth for a brief moment, bringing back some of my fondest memories," Stan Wagman wrote, a sentiment echoed by all who attended.

Heller says they are now planning another reunion in Las Vegas in two years.

"We hope that we will be able to hear from the few who we were unable to locate. And we hope that we will continue meeting in the future."

Lebovic campus will be home to organic garden

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In addition to the Jewish schools, Jewish community centre and other buildings that were in the original plans for the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, plans are now in the works to create an organic garden that is expected to serve as an environmental learning centre.

The project came about after members of Torat HaTeva, a Jewish environmental organization, approached UJA Federation of Greater Toronto about establishing the garden on the Vaughan site.

"There's an area that is part of the Don River system," Shai Spetgang, an environmental consultant who serves as chair of Torat HaTeva's board of directors, told The CJN. "No one's allowed to develop there, but everywhere around it will be buildings and homes."

The garden will be at least 20 by 30 metres in area, as part of at least five acres of conservation land, said Spetgang. He added that, in addition to serving an educational function, the garden will produce fruits and vegetables for the Community Supported Agriculture (CSA) project at the Narayever Congregation and for a similar project to be based in the Thornhill area. CSA projects provide organic produce to their members on a weekly basis.

Risa Alyson Strauss, the organic garden project co-ordinator, said the goal is to break ground and put the garden on site for spring 2008.

To begin, she said, volunteers and program participants will "build" the soil, in part by planting low-maintenance crops that will add nutrients and vitamins.

A naturalized area will include plantings of species that already exist on site or that would grow there on their own, like red osier dogwood, a hardy shrub that thrives in wet conditions.

Recently, Torat HaTeva received two grants to make the garden a reality, one from Evergreen in partnership with Wal-Mart Canada for $4,500, and the other for $5,000 from Shell Canada's Shell Environmental Fund.

Organizers are still fundraising and writing grant proposals, said Strauss.

"The combined funding they have received so far will pay for "getting a basic garden in the ground" and creating raised garden beds, as well as a composting demonstration site and a couple of rainbarrels to collect rainwater, she said.

Additional funding would enable them to build a small greenhouse and hire an educator, said Strauss.

Income from selling the garden's produce and from fees paid by user groups would go toward running the garden on an annual basis, she added.

Strauss, who works for the City of Toronto as the program specialist for children's garden programs, said she believes that "Judaism is so rich in ecological and agricultural wisdom, and that an organic garden will give children and community members a chance to access these teachings through experiential programs and projects."

In addition, said Spetgang, it will "help connect the disconnect when we go to the supermarket. There's a great gap. We don't really know where our food comes from."

Bryan Keshen, executive director of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre – the Jewish community centre that will be built on the Lebovic campus – said that having access to a resource like the organic garden is "a wonderful opportunity."

"There's a general desire to see both environmental education and environmentally sensitive design going into everything we do," he said.

Foster families needed

"We do what we can to help them live Jewishly, but these kids still feel isolated. Living in a Jewish foster home is the ideal situation."

He is "troubled" that the community is not responding to the agency's needs, he said. "We are looking for 10 families who can step up to the challenge of opening up their home, and working with us to support a child in our community."

The community is "fabulous in supporting a variety of causes, but we're struggling to get people to give their time. We need people to care about these kids."

"Our foster families have told us that fostering has positively changed their lives, the lives of their family and the lives of the foster children."

Hurwitz said they are willing to come out and talk to prospective foster parents about fostering, and will also speak at Jewish organizations and service clubs.

"We provide financial support and support in working with the kids. These are kids of our Jewish community, and we all have a responsibility to help out. We want them to grow up and take care of themselves."

New organization supports Jewish education

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Michael Ettedgui has founded an organization to support formal and informal Jewish education in a variety of countries, beginning with Bolivia, Colombia and Uruguay. He is also investigating needs in other Latin American countries, the Caribbean and sub-Saharan Africa.

Michael Ettedgui and Susana Soloducho, director of Montevideo's Escuela Integral Hebreo Uruguaya, on Ettedgui's recent trip to South America.

Inspired in part by the memory of his late grandfather — Marcos Soberano, a strong proponent of Jewish and secular education — Ettedgui named the organization Yaldeinu: The Marcos Soberano Society for Jewish Education and Camping.

Soberano died in 2005, 41 years after emigrating from Tangiers with his wife and 10 children (an 11th would be born in Canada).

Ettedgui, a 26-year-old resident of Thornhill who attended Or Haemet Sephardic School until Grade 3, has always wanted to work in the Jewish community, he said in a recent interview.

After receiving his BA in political science from York University, Ettedgui worked as an education associate for the Toronto-based Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies. He continues to consult for them on a freelance basis, but his main focus now is Yaldeinu. The name is Hebrew for "Our Children."

Yaldeinu is a registered non-profit corporation, and Ettedgui is working on attaining charitable status for it. For now, he runs it single-handedly out of a donated office at the business premises of a relative of his.

The organization's annual budget is "in the six figures," Ettedgui said. The exact amount for its second year will be determined by fundraising, which is set to begin in the next few months.

The new organization, which Ettedgui conceived of six months ago and founded in October, is funded by a small group of local philanthropists.

Among the factors contributing to Ettedgui's idea was his strong belief "that education — formal and informal — is the key to the continuity of the Jewish people, and that if we don't invest in education of our children now, then future generations will be ill equipped to lead our community."

Also, he credits the traditional Moroccan Jewish community in which he was raised, and his work for three summers at Camp Torolago, a Jewish overnight camp that hosts Israeli victims of terror. Ettedgui's involvement in bringing the Israeli campers here helped him realize the importance of assisting young people as well as the importance of informal Jewish education, he said.

As an undergraduate spending a year at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, he led a mission to Ukraine and Moscow to bring the Passover seder to Jews there, another experience that had an impact on him.

After some initial research for Yaldeinu, Ettedgui concluded that there "seems to be a void of international funding dedicated to Jewish education in Latin American communities."

Last month, Ettedgui, who speaks Spanish fluently, visited Montevideo, La Paz and Bogota to meet with Jewish community leaders and see for himself the situation in each city.

In Montevideo, which has a Jewish population of about 15,000, there are two Jewish schools. A third closed its doors recently, and about 70 per cent of Jewish day school students receive tuition assistance, said Ettedgui.

The Jewish community in La Paz is down to 200 people, Ettedgui said. There is a Jewish school, but only a handful of the 300 students are Jewish, he added. There are also Jewish children who don't attend the school, but there is a supplementary school in the community.

"It's the kind of community where little sums of money will go a long way," he said. He is looking at bringing about 10 children between ages 11 and 14, and one madrich (leader), to summer camp from La Paz.

Yaldeinu is partnering with La Paz' Circulo Israelita, which oversees Jewish education there. Ettedgui plans to send Spanish language teaching materials there, and bring local children to Canadian summer camps including Torolago.

Bogota, which has one Jewish school serving 275 students in a Jewish population of about 2,000, has a "very connected Jewish community, but with a hard-hit middle class," said Ettedgui. He plans to provide tuition scholarships and pedagogic materials to them.

Having visited the communities himself, he said he feels "an urgent responsibility to make good and help" them.

He also plans to bring Israeli children to camps here, and plans to put donors and recipients in contact where possible. "We want to create lasting relationships between Jewish people the world over."

"Yaldeinu will go wherever there's a need, and that we can afford."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency
Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

In his personal memoir, A Tale of Love and Darkness, Amos Oz describes in beautiful detail the story of his family's phone calls from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv in the 1940s. The calls, which only took place every three or four months, were planned weeks ahead by sending letters to confirm the exact date and time. During the days leading up to each call, Amos and his parents prepared themselves, ensuring that they would be on time and sound healthy over the phone. On the day of the call, they would put on their best clothes and march down to the pharmacy, the only local phone, to perform the ritual. At the appointed time, Amos' father would call the operator and ask to be connected to Tel Aviv 648 (imagine, a three digit phone number!) The operator would ask him to hold as the line was being used for another call.

The magnitude of the preparations was matched only by the excitement with which the young Oz beheld the event. In the hours leading up to the call, Oz would run back and forth from the clock in the kitchen to his father in the living room, counting down the minutes as if it were a NASA shuttle launch.

As I grew up, my family gathered for a similar ritual. Every Sunday morning, my parents, sister, aunt, uncle and cousins would assemble – one week at my house and the next at my aunt's – to call my grandmother in South Africa. At the appointed time, my grandmother was wheeled to the telephone at her old age home and would sit waiting for our call, much as Oz's family did. I remember the excitement of waking up early in anticipation of the call, the planning of what I would share, and the inevitable disappointment when the call was over and I suddenly realized that I had forgotten the most important detail.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

Living in the age of cell-phones and instant messaging, many young people may view my and Oz's shared childhood experiences as mundane. With the steady development of communication technologies, are we losing the excitement of reaching across the ocean?

The summer after I completed Grade 11, I travelled to Poland, Ukraine and Israel with a group of American teens. When I returned from the trip, I yearned to reconnect with my new friends. I was quickly introduced to the world of Instant Messenger. Since that summer, I have spent hundreds of hours sitting in front of a computer typing to friends and relatives around the world.

Last Sunday, I met, online, the daughter of a close friend living in Boston. When the live video image of the five-year-old popped up on my screen, we chatted awhile, each of us seeing and hearing the other. A few minutes into the conversation, she wanted to tell me a joke but couldn't remember the punch line. So she picked up the telephone and called her grandmother in New York. The three of us, from three different cities and three different generations, were connecting in a way that the young Oz could never have imagined.

With these new tools, however, we've lost an ability to communicate. Working with teenagers during the summer, I am amazed when they run to the computer labs during their free time to instant message with their friends sitting across the table. Instead of speaking in person or on the phone, they pour out their inner thoughts and emotions on a keyboard.

Communicating is a basic human desire. While technology has made communication more accessible than it was in Oz's youth, we must be careful to ensure that it does not jeopardize the quality of these conversations – the ability to talk, share, empathize and attend. Some would say that our kids have lost the ability to communicate. In truth, they may just be out of practice.

The night before the brit milah

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The joyous nature of henna has certainly been the guarantee of its popularity. Everyone has been to, or at least heard of, the henna party – that pre-wedding night event wherein the bride, on her return home from the mikvah, is fitted for the first time into the elaborate gown of velvet and gold embroidery in which she will be wed. (Before the acceptance of the white western bridal gown, this in fact was the usual bridal costume.)

Unfortunately, a tradition that is not so well maintained – and indeed even known – is that of the "brit Yitzchak," also known by various other terms: talamon or thahid, which are just different names for the same thing. I might add that this custom, with some significant variations, exists amongst Ashkenazi communities, where it is commonly referred to as "kriyas Shema leining" or "vacht nacht."

This custom concerns itself with the birth of a boy. It is a ritual that is performed on the night prior to the baby's brit milah (bris). It is always done at the home where the baby and mother sleep. As an event, it combines the magic of mysticism with the solid foundations of family and faith.

The belief is that just before complying with such a great mitzvah as brit milah, being brought into the Covenant, the child is vulnerable and in need of divine protection. This is part of the concept of the constant battle of good versus evil.

Hence, on this night, the family will gather, ensuring that there is at least the quorum of a minyan. After Arvit/Ma'ariv is said, all windows, doors and any other openings in the home are closed. Then, the verse relating to the episode of Noah's ark is first said: "And they went in [to the ark], male and female as God commanded him [Noah], and God shut him in."

In the same way as the hermetically sealed ark contained one family, and with it the future of life, this home, too, now likewise holds that promise. Kabbalistically, at this moment of inclusion, one is also excluding anyone or anything such as evil spirits from being present.

The ceremony continues by symbolically taking a knife or a sword (thahid from the Arabic hadida meaning metal strip), which is passed over the walls and closed openings of the room containing the mother and her baby.

The liturgical part of the ceremony continues with a reading from Zohar, followed by the recital of the priestly blessing and two psalms, 91 and 121. The same sword and a book of Psalms are placed by the child and a specific amulet for this is hung over the crib till morning.

Before concluding the vigil with a festive meal, the words of Jacob's eternal blessing to Ephraim and Menashe are repeated three times to the baby: "The angel who saved me from all evil should bless these children and let my name be blessed in them and the names of my fathers Abraham and Isaac, and let them grow into a multitude like the fish in the midst of the earth... Joseph is a fruitful vine by a fountain, its branches run over the wall."

Just Say Nu... Yiddish for Every Occasion (When English Just Won't Do) by Michael Wex, St. Martin's Press.

Yiddish is still breathing – but hardly. Learned experts have been predicting its demise for over a century. Abe Cahan, long-time editor of the Daily Forverts saw Yiddish as dead and buried by 1933. But as the late I.B. Singer pointed out, “In Jewish life, it’s a long way between being sick and being dead.”

At one time, the Yiddish press and periodicals in North America had a combined circulation of 800,000 – and readership was probably close to twice that figure. In New York City alone, there were 12 full-time Yiddish theatres.

In the period before World War II, most of the world’s Jews conversed in Yiddish. Growing out of medieval German, with elements drawn from Slavic languages and the holy tongue of Hebrew, Yiddish was a lingua franca for Ashkenazi Jews throughout eastern Europe and Germany, gradually spreading to far-flung Jewish communities in the United States and Australia.

Then, history played a series of ugly tricks on Yiddish. The Nazis wiped out half of its speakers in the Holocaust, and Stalin crushed another large segment. But in some ways, the worst damage was done by the freedom and comforts of North America,

Jewish Life

A new way to learn Yiddish as assimilation drained Jewish Americans of the need to speak a language all their own.

Canadians will remember with nostalgic affection a number of organizations that struggled valiantly to preserve Yiddish. The Workmen’s Circle (Arbeter Ring) – which, in the ‘30s harboured a socialist-cosmopolitan outlook – engaged in numerous Yiddish cultural activities that included afternoon elementary and high school Yiddish classes, a summer camp, concerts, lectures and journals in Yiddish.

The Farband (socialist-Zionist) and the left-wing Jewish People’s Fraternal Order worked the same side of the street, only on a smaller scale.

Michael Wex, who lives in Toronto, has been hailed as “one of the leading lights of the current Yiddish revival.” He lectures widely on Yiddish themes and is the author of the recent enthusiastically welcomed book, Born to Kvetch. Publishers Weekly called it “a treasure-trove of linguistics, sociology, history and folklore.”

Just Say Nu contains nine chapters and provides Yiddish expressions for such life situations as meeting and greeting, food and drink, family life, health and illness, and love and sex.

The author asserts that the eager beginner can go a long way conversationally with little more than the following five words: “Nu” (well), “shoyen” (already), “epes” (sort of), “takeh” (exactly) and “nebach” (too bad).

Wex offers hundreds of Yiddish phrases and expressions to cover every mood and situation.

Food: Es hot der bubes tam – “It has my grandmother’s taste.” Oy, iz dos a meichl – “Oy, is this a taste treat!” Er shput de kishkeh – “He stuffs his guts.”

Family life: Mach tsee doos mohl – “Shut your mouth.” Zits in kris in shveig – “Sit and grind your teeth and be quiet.” Er tselaygt zach vee baym tatin in veingorn – “He’s lying around like he is in his father’s vineyard.”

Health and sickness: toyb vee dee vant – “deaf as the wall,” oysgemitchet – “exhausted.”

One criticism – the author is a bit too free with four-letter words, and it’s no surprise that the book’s longest chapter is on “love and sex.” Do we really need 11 designations for women’s breasts and 12 terms for female genitalia?

The volume is enhanced by a Yiddish-English glossary and a brief appendix of basic Yiddish grammar. Final word to eager readers, hot hanooeh – “enjoy.”

Believe it or not, Jews don’t have an exclusive lock on chicken soup. There are a quite a few variations that would make any bubbe’s head spin. These international recipes are taken from a variety of websites, some of which are not intended for kosher palates. So you will have to do some substitutions if dairy products are called for.

How about a bowl of “murug”? A favourite of Calcutta Jews, this Oriental chicken soup calls for ginger, turmeric and coriander, and is served over rice. As the Jerusalem Post’s Judy Montagu discovered, “Some 200 years ago, as Jews moved from Basra and Aleppo, in Iraq and Syria, to Calcutta, they took along Middle Eastern foods, including murug, which then absorbed some Indian influences.” [tinyurl.com/32xv36j]

I can’t guarantee that bubbe never made the following recipes, but if she did, she probably had different names for them. Rogov cautions that these recipes are not easy to make, but “when prepared well, each of these dishes is a mini-masterpiece that will have your guests sighing with joy.” [tinyurl.com/vupdyj]

Preparing food for your baby can be fun, exciting

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I have a four-month-old – my first – and I am starting to think about introducing solids. I really feel that I want to and should make the food myself for superior quality. How do I go about this?

A. I often hear this question from first-time moms. Good for you for wanting to do it yourself. First, your baby should typically start solids around six months of age. The recommendations used to be four months, but the World Health Organization changed it a few years ago, and now it is recommended that babies generally be exclusively breast or bottle fed for six months.

At around six months, you can start introducing solids, and you would usually start with baby cereal, first rice, then barley, then oats, then mixed grains. You should give each cereal a few times a day for four or five days to ensure that the baby is tolerating it and is not showing any allergic signs. Then you can progress to the next cereal. The cereal should be offered warm, not hot, and should be about the consistency of a pureed soup – fairly loose. For best results, give it when your baby is hungry but not starving.

Start by making about one tablespoon total, and you can increase up to one-quarter to one-half a cup at each meal, depending on your baby's appetite. Cereal should be viewed as the carb of the meal and can be offered at all three meals. Don't be surprised if your baby spits out and refuses cereal at first. It is a very foreign texture and taste, and the infant will likely be reluctant to accept it.

Once you have introduced cereal, you can start fruit and vegetables. There is a debate about whether to do fruit first or vegetables. The debate generally centres on the sweetness of fruit, and therefore leans toward veggies first; however, the first veggies recommended are carrots, squash and sweet potato, which are all quite sweet. The first fruits are usually apples, bananas and pears.

When first introducing these, offer only one new food every 24 to 48 hours, again to ensure tolerance and possible allergies, and then move to the next. Once you have introduced all of these fruits and vegetables, you can feed your baby a nicely balanced meal three times a day, i.e., cereal plus fruit or cereal plus veggies or cereal plus fruit and vegetables.

About Nutrition

Now the make it at home or buy it debate: although I do make a lot from scratch and do not love packaged, processed foods, I believe that store-bought baby food is very clean, healthy and safe. In the interest of saving time and quality control, I think this is a great choice. If you do make food at home, remember that it is essential to carefully clean or sterilize tools, surfaces, hands and ingredients.

There are some good books on making baby food, and the public health department puts out a great kit on this, which you can order from your local department. One important note about baby food: make sure you do not keep opened jars longer than the recommended shelf life, usually one or two days. I used to write the date on the lid with a permanent marker so that I could remember, because I often opened several new jars at a time.

If you choose to buy baby food, you will find a vast array of jarred, frozen, conventional and organic varieties to choose from. Always select ones that contain only one new ingredient at a time and are age and texture appropriate.

When your baby is ready for baby meats – around eight or nine months – this is a good time to make your own if you want. I used to boil a piece of chicken along with a peeled apple and a peeled sweet potato or carrots. When everything is soft, puree it with chicken stock and freeze it in ice cube trays. Meat alone is not very palatable, so mixing it with fruit and vegetables makes it smooth and flavourful. If you are using a chicken stock, make sure that it is natural, without a lot of added salt and has no MSG or colouring (a small amount of salt is okay).

This is a fun and exciting time, enjoy the process.

Wolbrom visited Poland

Three years ago, Wolbrom visited Poland for the first time since the war, with his daughters and grandchildren, and then continued on to Israel with grandsons Jared and Dan.

Throughout the Beit Halochem mission, Wolbrom never missed an event and never complained about anything (an accomplishment within itself). He waded in the Dead Sea, hiked in Ein Gedi, entertained us all with his wonderful stories and anecdotes and always walked steadily, with his grandsons gently supporting him on each arm. In fact, his relationship with his grandsons is so infectious that it made all of us younger folk more in tune with the needs of the older participants on the trip. Young and old alike, we danced and laughed together and cared for one another.

Watching Wolbrom on the mission with his grandsons was a gift for all of us. A moment did not go by without a touch, a joke, a smile or a squeeze. Small yet meaningful gestures that we all crave at any age.

Israeli doctor trying to build healthcare infrastructure in war-torn city

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In Dr. Ethan Rubinstein's eyes, Kabul, the capital city of Afghanistan, looks much the same as Gaza. The sidewalks are broken and dusty, the buildings scarred by war. There is no sewage system and infrequent electricity.

"I saw immense poverty," says the Israeli born and educated physician who recently returned from his first trip to Afghanistan. "And everybody, even kids, has a weapon."

Rubinstein, a Winnipeg-based infectious disease specialist, was in Kabul with colleagues Dr. Robert Chase and Dr. Wassay Naizi — an infectious diseases specialist in Kabul before moving to Winnipeg — from mid-November to early December to look into the possibility of building a public health infrastructure for Afghanistan.

The situation now is that health care is delivered throughout Afghanistan by an assortment of NGOs and foreign donor organizations such as USAID, the World Health Organization, the EEC and the Asian Development Bank. "Right now, there are no national health-care standards in Afghanistan," Rubinstein says. "The government has little or no money for health care. Each of the country's 39 provinces has a different health-care provider. There is no national reporting system, so no one knows how much disease there is in the country as a whole or in most areas of the country."

Although the population of Afghanistan is estimated to be about 17 million, there has been no census conducted in many years, Rubinstein notes.

The three Winnipeg doctors were in Afghanistan under the auspices of Canada's International Development and Research Corporation (IDRC). Their objective was to meet with representatives of all the health-care delivery organizations active in the country and begin to create a national health-care platform which brings all the organizations to the same page.

"We conducted a two-day symposium where we talked about a standardized program of health-care studies with compensation for the students," Rubinstein says.

The three specialists are envisioning a four-year course of studies consisting of eight courses, each six months in duration. "As much as possible, we would like to see Afghans doing the teaching," Rubinstein says.

He and his colleagues foresee the University of Manitoba — in partnership with the government of Afghanistan's health ministry — taking the lead in providing the curriculum, providing some of the instructors and overseeing the program. They estimate that the four-year program will cost about $6 million. They are hopeful that Ottawa and/or the World Bank will provide the funding.

"Canada has a solid history of international development," Rubenstein says. "Development programs such as the one we are proposing, if successful, have a far greater impact than military actions and are much less expensive."

While being an Israeli was not an issue for Rubinstein in Kabul, he does note that the city and country remain extremely dangerous for foreigners. "We weren't allowed to leave our hotel rooms without guards," he says, "and in most areas we weren't allowed to walk in the street."

Rubinstein has been practicing medicine in Winnipeg for three years. He is on staff at both the Health Sciences Centre and the St. Boniface General Hospital. He received his post-graduate training in Switzerland and London, and at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, Md. and Loma Linda University in Loma Linda, Ca. He was in practice in Tel Aviv before coming to Winnipeg.

Keeping our brains active helps memory recall

BY FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — We all know that a healthy lifestyle — eating properly and being active — is key to helping us live better and longer lives.

Yet this did not stop hundreds of men and women — looking to learn more about their brains and discover methods to ward off memory loss — from signing up for the Brainy Boomers lecture series that took place last October.

The program was initiated by the McGill Centre for Studies in Aging, as a joint project with the Alzheimer Society of Montreal, with assistance from the Jewish General Hospital and l'Institut universitaire de gériatrie de Montréal.

The three-part series stressed taking charge of our brains — a complex and intriguing organ that controls all of our physical and mental functions, much like a computer — and opened with a session on Memory and Aging. Dr. Lorraine Mazzella-Maiolo talked about how the brain functions, what happens to memory when there is brain damage, and noted that "old is not defined by age but by decreased function/dependence on others."

She explained that although there is aging or shrinking of the brain which may cause a decrease in memory in a relatively normal person, there are ways to help ourselves retain things by "planning, organizing and writing things down."

Mazzella-Maiolo said it is important to continue to be active, interact with others, have social engagements and attend functions, take courses, and learn something new like a language, dancing, or how to use the computer.

The second lecture, Nutrition for a Healthy Brain with Risa Sigal, clinical dietitian, reviewed the importance of following Canada's Food Guide. Sigal reviewed the dietary recommended intakes (amount of nutrients and calories) we each require for good health and the prevention of chronic disease.

Our daily diets should include at least one dark green and one orange vegetable or fruit and important nutrients such as iron, potassium, antioxidants, vitamin C, folic acid, vitamin A, fibre and grain products lower in fat, sugar and salt, as well as an adequate intake of calcium through milk, cheeses and yogurt.

Dr. Lennie Babins and Dr. Nora Kelner introduced Brain Gym and Memory Gymnastics, the final lecture of the series, and gave strategies to recall information and thus help us improve our memories.

Seminar series to start Jan. 16

The Toronto branch of Jews for Judaism will present its flagship program, a free "counter-missionary survival seminar," over six consecutive weeks, starting Jan. 16, at Congregation Shaarei Tzedec on Markham Street in downtown Toronto. The program is designed to point out the reasons why Judaism does not accept Jesus.

This is especially pertinent today, as many use the Internet to find Jewish answers, says Ciss, and it is almost impossible to search for a Jewish topic without getting a number of responses from Christian groups.

"Ultimately, you're going to get 'Hebrew Christian' groups that will come up in some kind of search. These are spiritual predators. A lot of these groups have fluency in Hebrew and Judaism," says Ciss. Continuing to respond to these threats, Jews for Judaism is revamping their Internet home in 2008, www.jewsforjudaism.org.

What he is most proud of over 18 years is hearing how missionaries complain how difficult it is to get their message out, due to Jews for Judaism's activity. "It's because of the education we've been inculcating in our community," says Ciss.

"The preventative work we do makes us the pre-eminent group that works to stop the message of Christian missionaries and the misinformation that they are disseminating."

Food, Scrumptious Food

Food Made Fast saves kitchen time

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The well-known cookware establishment Williams-Sonoma has just introduced a new cookbook series, Food Made Fast (Oxmoor House; Fall 2006).

The 15-volume series is being released in batches. The first five books to be released are Pasta, Soup, Weeknight, Baking and Slow Cooker. The authors are Brigit Binns, Georgette Brennan, Melanie Barnard and Lou Seibert Pappas.

Each book is divided into dishes that are "30 minutes start to finish," "15 minutes hands-on time" and "Make more to store," and has over 90 full-colour photographs and 40 recipes.

Designed for busy people who can't or don't want to spend a lot of time in the kitchen, this series of books is all about getting a delicious dinner on the table – fast! The recipes are well-written and measurements are given in both "American" and metric (only the American have been included below).

In Baking, you'll find suggestions on how to fit baking into your schedule, how to shop efficiently to save time, and great recipes to enable you to have delicious baked goods on hand that take as little as 30 minutes.

Weeknight offers dishes like Thai Chicken Satay, Miso-glazed Salmon with Bok Choy and Chimichurri Steak that take 20 minutes from start to finish. In the "Make more to store" section, there is a recipe for Classic Roast Chicken to serve four, which makes enough to have leftovers for Chicken & Spinach Quesadillas, Chicken Couscous with Dried Fruit and Chicken & Mango Salad.

Slow Cooker offers recipes for Chicken Cacciatore, Braised Short Ribs – even dishes like Braised Duck with Figs & Port that take only 15 minutes hands-on time.

Soup offers dozens of simple and delicious soups designed with the busy cook in mind – all with very little effort.

Pasta, in addition to its 15- and 30-minute recipes, offers suggestions for making more than one meal from a recipe. Make the basic tomato-basil sauce for dinner tonight, store the remainder of the sauce (storage tips are given), and have two more meals of Spaghetti & Meatballs and Sausage Lasagna.

With this series, you won't have any more excuses to not cook, no matter how busy or hectic your day!

LEMONGRASS CHICKEN & ASPARAGUS

30 minutes start to finish

Cook's Tip: Lemongrass is available in many markets. Leave it out if you can't find it. Substitute 2 tsp. grated lemon zest and 1 tsp. lemon juice. Add the zest and juice along with the garlic and ginger in the first step.

- 4 skinless, boneless chicken breast halves, about 1 1/2 lb. total weight, cut into thin strips
- salt and freshly ground pepper
- 2 tsp. peanut or canola oil
- 1/4 cup green (spring) onions, thinly sliced
- 2 tsp. ginger, minced
- 1 stalk lemongrass, bulb part only, trimmed and finely chopped

- 3 large cloves garlic, minced
- 1/2 lb. slender asparagus, trimmed and sliced on the diagonal
- 1/4 cup chicken broth
- 1/4 cup peanuts, (1 1/2 oz.), chopped
- steamed white rice, for serving

Stir-fry the chicken. Season the chicken lightly with salt and pepper. In a frying pan or wok over high heat, warm the oil. Add the chicken and stir-fry until golden on the outside and opaque throughout, 2-3 minutes. Transfer to a plate. Add the green onions and stir-fry until fragrant, 1-2 minutes.

Add the ginger, lemongrass and garlic and stir-fry for 30 seconds. Add the asparagus and stir-fry just until tender-crisp, 2-3 minutes.

Finish the dish. Add the broth to the pan and bring to a simmer. Return the chicken and any juices from the plate to the pan, reduce the heat to medium-low, and simmer for 1 minute to heat through. Sprinkle with the peanuts. Spoon the rice onto individual plates, top with the chicken and asparagus, and serve.

Here's another recipe from the Williams-Sonoma Kitchen.

WINTER GREENS SALAD WITH ORANGES & GOAT CHEESE

This refreshing salad combines three members of the chicory family (frisée, radicchio and Belgian endive), which have a pleasantly bitter taste. Oranges add a note of sweetness, while goat cheese lends a creamy texture.

For the vinaigrette

- 1 tbsp. Champagne or white wine vinegar
- zest of 1/2 orange
- 1 tbsp. fresh orange juice
- 1 tsp. Dijon mustard
- 1/4 cup olive oil
- salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste

- 8-oz. log of goat cheese
- 1 cup finely chopped toasted pecans
- 1 head frisée, leaves torn
- 1/2 head radicchio, thinly sliced
- 4 Belgian endive, thinly sliced
- 4 oranges, peeled and segmented

Preheat an oven to 350.

To make the vinaigrette, combine the vinegar, orange zest, orange juice, mustard, olive oil, salt and pepper and blend until emulsified. Alternatively, in a small bowl, whisk together all the ingredients until emulsified. Set aside.

Cut the goat cheese into 1-oz. rounds. Using your fingers, carefully reshape any uneven rounds. Put the pecans in a bread pan or small bowl. Roll the goat cheese rounds in the pecans, pressing lightly so they adhere, then transfer to a baking sheet. Bake until the cheese is just soft and warm, 5 to 7 minutes.

Meanwhile, in large bowl, combine the frisée, radicchio and endive. Add the vinaigrette and toss to coat the greens evenly. Divide among 8 salad bowls or plates. Using a metal spatula, transfer 1 goat cheese round to each salad and garnish with the orange segments. Serve immediately. Serves 8.

Winnipeg to celebrate 100 years of Jewish education

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education is calling on alumni of Winnipeg's parochial Jewish school system to come together on March 30 to celebrate 100 years of Jewish education in the city.

The gala evening at the Fairmont Hotel includes dinner, dancing, a live auction and entertainment by alumni, with the performers still to be determined.

"We would also like to encourage alumni to lend us their memorabilia and artifacts," says Nona Leibl, who is co-chairing the event with lifelong friend and Talmud Torah classmate, Sharon Delbridge. Delbridge's mother, Rochelle Fink, was a principal in the Jewish school system at Ramah for many years. Leibl and Delbridge say that they hope to have 450 to 500 alumni in attendance at the gala.

The two women and their committee plan to have an area at the gala for school memorabilia and archives. As well, plaques on display will list all the past teachers and administrators.

"A lot of our alumni formed strong bonds with their classmates and have stayed in touch with each other," Leibl says.

Jewish education in Winnipeg goes back to 1902, when a Jewish studies program was established in one of the north Winnipeg public schools. It was in 1907, however, when Rabbi Israel Kahanovitch, Winnipeg's chief rabbi, inaugurated the Winnipeg Hebrew Free School — Talmud Torah in its own building in the city's north end, where the majority of the city's Jewish community resided. In 1912, the school moved to a larger location nearby.

Over the next couple of decades, a growing number of Jewish schools opened to educate the fast-growing Jewish population in the city, including the I.L. Peretz School, the Folk School and the Arbeiter Ring. In the interwar years and the immediate postwar years, secular Yiddish education dominated Jewish education in Winnipeg. The Peretz and Folk Schools merged in the 1930s to form the I.L. Peretz Folk School. Among the school's innovations were the introduction of kindergarten classes and an elementary day school program. Evening classes continued for older students up to Grade 12.

The Talmud Torah only started to grow in prominence after World War II, when Rabbi Avraham Kravitz became the new principal. Under his leadership, a Jewish high school day program was also developed. Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate opened in 1959, offering regular high school classes that included Jewish studies and Hebrew language classes.

In the 1950s, Winnipeg's Jewish population, which peaked at about 19,000, began shifting to the more affluent south Winnipeg, which had been unofficially barred to Jewish residents until after the war. In response, the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, relocated in south Winnipeg in 1949, opened a school. However, with an ever larger number of Jewish families "moving south," a much larger school was needed. Ramah Elementary School opened its doors in 1959.

The growing south Winnipeg Jewish population, combined with an overall decline in the city's Jewish population, led to a corresponding decrease in the number of Jewish students enrolled in the north end schools. Thus in 1981, the longtime rival Talmud Torah and Peretz Schools merged into one under the aegis of the new Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education. Ramah and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate were also brought under the central control of the new board.

In 1997, the north end Jewish school was closed and merged with Ramah in a new school — the junior kindergarten to Grade 12 Gray Academy of Jewish Education — located in south Winnipeg in the newly opened Asper Jewish Community Campus. Just under 600 students are enrolled in the school this year. Smaller numbers of Jewish students also attend two public school Hebrew bilingual programs and an independent, more religiously oriented elementary and junior high school program.

The gala is being co-sponsored by the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education, the Parent Advisory Committee and the Alumni Committee. Funds raised during the evening will be used to buy new laptop computers, LCD projectors and software for the school and to provide more professional training for staff.

Mediation / Arbitration in Family Law Disputes – Part II

Family Matters

by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
for 26 years

Question. Recently you wrote an article about how mediation can be a cheaper and faster way to resolve spousal disputes arising from separation by using one lawyer rather than two. What then is mediation/arbitration? What does a family law arbitrator in Ontario do? How does he replace a Court? Is he truly faster and more efficient than the public Courts? What training must he have? Are his decisions legally binding? What does he cost? How can he both mediate and arbitrate? What is the difference between mediation and arbitration? If I lose, can I appeal an arbitration ruling? Does the Ontario government keep track of his rulings? Does he have to keep records? Can he just be any hack? I'm not sure I will feel intimidated by my husband if I go to mediation or arbitration with my ex sitting beside me? Will the mediator/arbitrator protect me from signing away my rights to spousal support/child support or my house? Does a lawyer have to advise me before the mediation/arbitration or not?

Answer. In a recent issue, I explained the benefits and process of mediation/arbitration. To answer your specific questions: yes, once an arbitration agreement is signed and a certificate is obtained to show that both parties obtained Certificates of Independent Legal Advice, then the arbitrator does replace the trial judge (otherwise known as the "judge of first instance"). At this stage, the parties can no longer go to "Court". If either spouse does not like the decision of the arbitrator and has legal grounds for appeal, he or she can appeal the ruling of the arbitrator to a single Judge of the Superior Court later.

As an arbitrator, I am required to be familiar with family law, to keep records of all of my arbitrations and to submit reports of them to the Ontario government. Being a family law lawyer of 26 years, this presents no problem, but will be a major hurdle for certain well-meaning but less knowledgeable mental health professionals and social workers in our community. Accordingly, consumers should ask probing questions of potential mediator/arbitrators about their family law knowledge before retaining them as mediator/arbitrators. In addition, every arbitrator by April 30, 2008 must take a prescribed course in "power imbalances" between spouses to ensure that he/she can assist couples in need of mediation/arbitration and redirect those wherein a spouse may feel intimidated by their spouse. The costs of mediation and arbitration depend on each such mediator/arbitrator and typically are $3000-5000 daily, split between the parties.

Bill expected to advance to committee stage

Comeau said Bill S-210 will likely come for a vote on second reading when the Senate reconvenes later this winter. However, following consultations with Justice Minister Rob Nicholson, the Senate Conservatives have been advised not to support the bill.

The minister told Conservative senators that the bill would be unhelpful in tackling terrorism threats. "If we start to define every terrorist activity, some activities that are not defined won't be considered terrorist," Comeau said. "The bill, as it is, is at best unnecessary and could lead to confusion regarding current law on terrorism."

Comeau predicted, however, that given the Liberal majority in the Senate, the bill is likely to advance to committee stage.

Grafstein said such a step is long overdue, and he accused Conservatives of obstructing the bill. He also rejected Against Suicide Bombing. The group has embarked on an e-mail and traditional mail campaign to convince senators that Canada should criminalize suicide bombings. Many high-profile Canadians have signed a letter asking the Senate to pass the bill. Among them are former New Democratic Party leader Ed Broadbent; former prime minister Kim Campbell; former Alberta premier Ralph Klein; Maj.-Gen. (Ret.) Lewis MacKenzie; former Ontario chief justice Roy McMurtry; former Ontario premier Bob Rae; and Ontario Progressive Conservative leader John Tory.

An open letter adopted by the group states: "Suicide bombing has become all too common in many countries throughout the world. Thousands of civilians are killed and maimed to advance a cause based on falsely implanted expectations of glory and martyrdom. We say no cause can justify suicide bombing."

Grafstein contended that "there hasn't been a more distinguished bipartisan group of Canadians supporting" the bill.

In a separate development last weekend, the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FWSC) placed a full-page ad in the National Post "urging the United Nations to take action against suicide terror."

The ad (which can be seen at www.fwsc.ca) called on the UN General Assembly "to hold a special session to deal exclusively with the scourge of suicide terror." It also urged the international community to designate suicide bombings a crime against humanity, and it encouraged religious leaders to denounce those who believe suicide killings are undertaken in God's name.

Almost identical ads were placed by the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center in the New York Times and the International Herald Tribune.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for FWSC, said: "We certainly support Senator Grafstein's bill" and would like to see Parliament designate suicide bombings a crime against humanity.

He rejected the Justice Department's contention, as described by Comeau, that the bill would complicate efforts to address terrorist acts. Many crimes include clauses that more specifically define the offence, including child pornography (not limited to the general law against pornography), different killing offences (manslaughter, second-degree murder, first-degree murder), impaired-driving offences (which include an offence of causing death while driving impaired).

"There is absolutely no reason why we cannot specify that one of the acts of terror can't be suicide bombing," Adler said.

'It would make the Criminal Code more effective against those who counsel suicide bombings'

"I don't agree it will undermine the Criminal Code. On the contrary, it would make the Criminal Code more effective against those who counsel suicide bombings," he said, adding that when they were in Opposition, the Conservatives supported the bill.

A House subcommittee as well as a special committee of the Senate on the Anti-terrorism Act are each reviewing the Anti-terrorism Act. The Senate committee has not yet reported its findings.

Grafstein said once the bill advances to the committee stage, opponents' concerns can be addressed by calling witnesses and hearing other evidence. "The committee could recommend against it after it hears the evidence."

He suggested opposition to the bill originated with bureaucrats in the Department of Justice, who have influenced the current Conservative government and the previous Liberal one as well. The government is "allowing bureaucrats to call the shots. They've been proven wrong in the past. The best way to expose these views is to hold a public hearing," Grafstein said.

In the meantime, he continued, suicide bombings continue around the world, affecting thousands of people, including Canadian soldiers in Afghanistan who are potential targets for terror attacks.

Grafstein's efforts have found support in a grassroots organization called Canadians

Rady JCC undergoing major renovations

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the C/JN

WINNIPEG — The Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre is undergoing a $3-million renovation.

"Government funding, along with major community donors and supporters, made the project possible," says Rady JCC president Murray Gilfix.

The completion of the Kaufman Child Care Centre in November 2007 marked the first milestone in the planned renovation and expansion.

"The new Kaufman Child Care Centre is more than double the size of our previous quarters. We now have 82 children ranging from three months old to 12 years being looked after in the new centre," says Gail Waxman, the Rady JCC's executive director. "We have doubled the number of spaces for school age children in our before-and-after care program, and we now have 48 full-time preschool spaces."

"[But] even with the new expansion, we have a waiting list of over 200 for day care. Some people are putting their child's name on a wait list as soon as they know that they are expecting a child."

Visitors to the new centre's room for three- and four-year-olds are "impressed by the amount of light the facility gets," Waxman says.

"We also have a new infant room for children three months to two years old, which has its own kitchen and a nap room. We have up to 12 spaces in this program, which is a new program for us," she adds.

Tannis Podheiser Michaw, a parent with children at the new centre says, "I am happy to see my children thriving in this new child-care centre... The new facility is comfortable, spacious, and bright."

Children aren't the only ones who will benefit from the renovations underway. Adult fitness facilities at the Rady JCC are also being upgraded.

"We are expanding the track area upstairs, and on completion, we will have 100 pieces of workout equipment. Right now, we have only 50 or 60 pieces," Waxman says.

In addition, a new group fitness room double the size of the current space is being built, she says. "We have dedicated part of the area as a spin room for our spin program [aerobics on a stationary bike]."

Other renovations include a new youth lounge, a new membership area, new offices, and larger new locker rooms.

"We are anticipating that everything but the locker rooms will be ready by winter 2008. The locker rooms will be completed sometime later in the year," Waxman notes.

The Rady JCC currently has 5,000 members, about 50 per cent of whom aren't Jewish, she says.

But others enjoy the centre, too. "There are many people who attend the programs offered by the Rady JCC but are not members," Waxman notes. "With the new expansion of our facilities we could accommodate up to another 500 new members."

"We have not lost any members this year, despite the inconvenience of the renovations. This is a good sign," says Ilanit Shapiro, the new marketing director of the Rady JCC who moved to Winnipeg with her family from Toronto two years ago.

"I am confident that with our bright new state of the art facility, it won't be long until we are at capacity levels again," Shapiro says.

Waxman says that before the renovations began, the Rady JCC "had problems with crowding," because too many people wanted to use the fitness facilities at the same time.

A family membership at the Rady JCC is $995. The centre has announced that it will be instituting an initiation fee for new members, as other fitness facilities in the city do. "This fee will not apply to current members, which is in accordance with the standard practice of other fitness centres in the city," Waxman says.

Winnipeg Kashrut administrator leaves for new post

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, Winnipeg's kashrut administrator since August 2006, has resigned his position with the Vaad Ha'in of Winnipeg to become a geriatric home chaplain in Milwaukee.

He dropped into the office on Dec. 23 to turn in his keys, says vaad president Don Aronovitch.

Rabbi Cohen, who assumes his new posting on Jan. 21, was born and raised in Chicago, where he trained in and gained his first experience in kashrut supervision. He had served as kashrut administrator in Ottawa for a number of years before coming to Winnipeg.

The Winnipeg vaad originally hired Rabbi Cohen as a consultant in February 2006. The vaad's goal in bringing Rabbi Cohen in, says Aronovitch, was to raise the WK kashrut standard, which was considered suspect in some quarters, to the normal standard.

"He did a phenomenal job for us," Aronovitch says. "He raised the standard to the desired level faster than we thought possible."

Rabbi Cohen takes pride in what he was able to accomplish here. He has particular praise for longtime mashgiach Gabe Broges, and also for Rabbi Yacov Zerkowitz, who started working as a mashgiach here shortly after Rabbi Cohen became full-time kashrut administrator.

Some difficulties were, however, encountered in raising the kashrut standards.

The community's two ritual slaughterers were retired in the summer of 2006 and have not been replaced. Also, for a time, the vaad temporarily had to suspend the certification for Omnitsky Kasher Food, the community's only kosher butcher, until the ownership agreed to meet the higher standard.

In his new position, Rabbi Cohen will serve as chaplain at the Jewish Home and Care Centre, an institution with 450 beds divided between two locations in Milwaukee. He decided to take the new job, he says, because it fits in well with his background and training, and also because Milwaukee is closer to his hometown of Chicago.

"My mother has not been well for the last few years," he says. "My family and I wanted to be closer to her."

Rabbi Zerkowitz has been appointed as the interim kashrut administrator for the community. The young Chabad rabbi has been the full-time mashgiach at Omnitsky since September, 2006.

Aronovitch reports that the vaad board is considering several different options. He hopes to be able to announce a decision about the vaad's future direction early in the new year.

Birthday bash in Quebec City

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A series of events highlighting the history, culture and personalities of Quebec City's Jewish community will be held throughout 2008 as part of the city's official 400th anniversary celebrations.

The plans were unveiled at a recent press conference at Beth Israel Ohev Shalom Synagogue, with the participation of Pro-Mayor Jacques Joli-Coeur and Pierre Boulanger, president and CEO of the Société du 400e, the official organizer of the anniversary activities.

The central event is an exhibition titled "Same cloth, different thread: the Jews of Quebec City," which will be at the Gare du Palais train station from early May until the end of September. Open and free of charge, the exhibition will focus on "colourful individuals" from the past.

"By telling our story, we hope that people will discover how a cultural minority can contribute and integrate into a greater society while maintaining its own identity," said Simon Jacobs, executive director of Exposition Shalom Quebec, the non-profit organization behind the Jewish community's participation in the 400th anniversary.

Shalom Quebec's first activity, supported by Heritage Canada, will be the launching in March of an interactive website that will contain documentation and photos about the community's past and present, a genealogical survey of Quebec's Jewish cemetery, the oldest Jewish cemetery still in use in Canada, and interviews with and information about community members.

STUDENTS CHALLENGED TO MAKE PEACE

HEEBONICS

Nothing trivial about this Jewish show

By AMY SOBERANO
Special to The CJN

Do you know the difference between LOL and Elul? Are you more familiar with the lineage of Jesus than with that of your forefathers? If so, the National Jewish Outreach Program, a non-profit independent organization dedicated to providing North American Jews with fundamental Jewish knowledge, wants to know.

Based in New York, the National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP) was founded 20 years ago in response to escalating assimilation into secular society and declining Jewish identity throughout North America. The organization recently celebrated its inauguration to YouTube with Jew Walking, a comedic critique of western Jewry.

Jew Walking follows interviewer-comedian Simmy Kay as he traverses Manhattan's Upper West Side asking the local Jewish population basic questions about American culture, Christianity, and their own religion (www.njop.org/html/jewwalking.html).

In the video, the frightening reality, illuminated by Kay, becomes painfully clear: the foundation of today's Jewish community is slowly but steadily crumbling from beneath us, and an increasing proportion of western Jewry identifies more with pop culture and commercialized Christianity than with Judaism.

Rabbi Yitzchak Rosenbaum, NJOP's associate director and a contributing member of the program since 1989, encourages parents to allow their children to pursue a Jewish education and to also do so themselves.

"We absorb secular culture because it's what's in the air. We must make a point to not become Jewishly ignorant," he says, adding that often people are not conscious of the magnitude of their own or of others' ignorance.

Jew Walking reflects the National Jewish Outreach Program's goals of instilling the importance of preserving Jewish identity and of providing people with the tools to do so.

Rabbi Rosenbaum says the ramifications of a widespread drift away from Judaism include a troubling rate of assimilation and intermarriage across the United States.

Although in Canada intermarriage is not a big a problem as in the United States, Rabbi Rosenbaum maintains that the trend is still the same.

"If you can't define yourself as a Jew, what is there to make you stick to being Jewish?" he asks.

He fears that if we lose touch with our Jewish identity, it will effortlessly dissolve into the myriad of western civilization and eventually all ties to Judaism will fade into ancestry.

Rabbi Rosenbaum says that the community and educational programs must work hand in hand to combat the increased general detachment from Jewish life. In a world inhabited by upward of six billion people, a population of only 13 million must unite or else face inevitable disintegration, he observes.

Approximately six million Jews live in the Dias-

Rabbi Yitzchak Rosenbaum, the National Jewish Outreach Program's associate director

pora, and Jewish neighbourhoods are becoming less frequent, membership in local community centres has declined, and a genuine connection with a synagogue has in many cases been reduced to convenience, compromise and consequently, disinterest.

As a minority, it is very difficult for Jews to maintain a committed Jewish identity within global society without a sense of belonging and unity, says Rabbi Rosenbaum.

Without a strong basis of Jewish knowledge and understanding, he believes it is impossible for the community to flourish. As well, it is difficult to defend the Jewish religion and culture without a basic understanding of its tenets.

In other words, the rabbi says, it is impossible to identify with something that we cannot define. That is not to say that the base-level knowledge of facts and terms tested in Jew Walking can equip one to truly define Judaism. Rather, it can serve as a starting point – as that first step along the path to understanding what it means to live a Jewish life.

The more one learns, the more one realizes how little they know, and it is from within that beautiful irony that a lifetime of education is propelled. So, too, with an increase in knowledge comes an increase in the depth and richness of experience, which only serves to further a more meaningful identification with Judaism.

NJOP attempts to unite the values of community and education by serving as a co-ordinating organization for Jewish life across Canada and the United States.

The Internet allows for NJOP to have an even greater impact – as evidenced firsthand by the instant popularity of Jew Walking. As of June 2007, the organization had reached close to one million North American Jews with its programs, at more than 3,650 locations in 35 countries worldwide, according to its website, www.njop.org.

NJOP strives to make its programs accessible. "We think people should really try it," says Rabbi Rosenbaum. "We're not going to make anyone become Jewishly committed, but don't walk away from Judaism without knowing what it is."

Bush visits Middle East in friendship

President expected to press Jerusalem to freeze settlements

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — The message from the White House on the eve of George W. Bush's first presidential visit to Israel was that his staunch support for the Jewish state has set the stage for peace and given him room to exert some pressure on Jerusalem.

Bush was to launch an eight-day tour of the region on Jan. 9, beginning with three days in Israel and the West Bank and continuing to Persian Gulf states, Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

In a Jan. 3 interview with Reuters, Bush said he would press Israel to freeze settlement expansion in the West Bank, considered by Palestinians to be the principal obstacle to peace.

"I will talk about Israeli settlement expansion, about how that is, that can be, you know, an impediment to success," he said. "The unauthorized outposts, for example, need to be dismantled, like the Israelis said they would do."

The next day Haim Ramon, the Israeli deputy prime minister, said such a crackdown on unauthorized outposts could come as early as next week.

During a pre-trip briefing on Jan. 3, Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, also said the question of settlements would come up. He praised Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert for pledging to tackle the issue.

"I think it's interesting that Prime Minister Olmert, in his comments this week, addressed this issue of settlements in terms of how — that there would be no additional confiscations, no new settlements and no confiscation of land, that sort of thing — no expansion of settlements," Hadley said. "So it is an issue. It is one we've talked about and is an issue that will be part of the discussions over the implementation of the 'road map.'"

A standoff over settlement construction would represent a rare public break between Washington and Jerusalem during Bush's two terms in the White House, and could raise unpleasant memories of the first president Bush and Israel feuding over settlements.

But, the White House argues, the current president's unflinching support for Jerusalem's tough anti-terrorist measures will go a long way toward smoothing over any disagreements.

One of the things that the younger Bush "did was, he made it very clear that there would be no compromise with terror, that the use of violence against innocents is not justified by any cause, and that any state — including Israel — has the right to defend itself against terror," Hadley said. "That built an enormous confidence in the Israeli government in the president."

Hadley downplayed expectations of a breakthrough, noting for instance that Bush would meet separately with Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

"It's probably going to be a series of bilateral meetings," Hadley said, counting out the prospect of a trilateral summit. Bush has no plans for a major address during his time in Israel — just a speech in the United Arab Emirates.

At the Jan. 3 briefing, Hadley was asked to challenge criticism that Bush neglected the Israeli-Palestinian crisis in his first seven years in office, waiting until last November to relaunch talks in Annapolis, Md.

In response, Hadley cited as other building blocks Bush's isolation of Yasser Arafat, the late Palestinian leader who never entirely eschewed terrorism, and the U.S. leader's open advocacy of Palestinian statehood, a first for a president, although former president Bill Clinton came close to doing so.

"What we now see is the emergence within the Palestinian community, in the form of President Abbas and Prime Minister [Salam] Fayyad, of leaders who are committed to peace and are willing to negotiate with Israel and understand the importance of fighting terror, and that terror will never be an avenue to get a Palestinian state," he said.

Hadley acknowledged some missteps taken by the Bush administration, including insisting on Palestinian legislative elections in 2006 that resulted in Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist terror group, taking power. He said that had a deleterious effect on the Bush policy of promoting democracy in the Middle East.

"I think the election of Hamas in the Palestinian elections gave a number of countries pause as to where this was heading," he said. "There has been, I think, concern in that respect."

Hadley said the White House would press Congress to approve $20 billion in arms sales to Saudi Arabia and its allies, arguing that the sales were critical.

"We think they're important as a signal of long-term U.S. commitment to the region and support for our friends and allies in the region," he said. "It's an important piece of our strategy in the region."

Hadley suggested that Bush would have tough words for the Egyptians over their failure to stop arms smuggling into the Gaza Strip, which is now controlled by Hamas.

He expressed understanding of Egypt's humanitarian concerns in allowing some Gazans to cross its territory to complete the Muslim hajj pilgrimage to Mecca.

"There are also people living in Gaza who wanted to participate in the hajj and a way needs to be found for them to do so," Hadley said. "On the other hand, we also see that Gaza is a place where Hamas and others reside and are building up the capacity to frustrate the hopes in the region for an Israeli-Palestinian peace."

"And so everyone in the region has a right and should be concerned about the flow of weapons and other instruments of war into Gaza that could be used to frustrate the opportunity we now have for peace."

World Jewish population hits 13.2 million

JERUSALEM — The world Jewish population in 2007 rose to 13.2 million, according to a Jerusalem-based think tank.

The figure is 200,000 more than in 2006, said a report released Sunday by the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.

In addition, the number of Jews living outside of Israel dropped by 100,000, and Israel's Jewish population grew by 300,000, making it home to 41 per cent of world Jewry.

The 92-page report, which can be found at www.jpppi.org.il, also discusses world reaction to the Second Lebanon War and tiers in Diaspora Jewry.

The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute was established by the Jewish Agency for Israel in 2002 as an independent, non-profit organization. The institute examines the challenges, threats and opportunities facing the Jewish people, and engages in long-term policy planning.

Experts debate terrorist inroads in Latin America

By LARRY LUXNER

JTA

ISLA DE SAN ANDRES, Colombia—This tiny, palm-fringed island off Nicaragua's Atlantic coast seems like an idyllic Caribbean paradise. Duty-free shops, resort hotels and rustic snack bars line streets filled with European scuba divers on holiday.

But a powerful Arab presence here has led to claims that a place famous for snorkeling and scuba diving is becoming a hotbed of Hezbollah terrorist activity.

Ely Karmon, director of Israel's Institute for Counter-Terrorism in Herzliya, says that since the 1980s Hezbollah has been recruiting and raising money from Lebanese and Syrian immigrants living in three specific areas of Latin America and the Caribbean: the tri-border area where Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay meet; Venezuela's Margarita Island; and the Caribbean coastline of Colombia, including Maicao and San Andres.

"In all three areas you have Lebanese Shi'ite communities," Karmon told JTA. "Latin America is a soft-belly target because nobody is prepared – not the law enforcement authorities, not the public, not the threat."

Others say the threat is overblown.

Chris Zambelis, a Middle East analyst with the Jamestown Foundation, a Washington-based think tank, says offshore islands like San Andres and Margarita do have large numbers of Muslims, but that "there's no evidence at all" to suggest that local Arab merchants are financing Hezbollah activities overseas.

"Colombian and regional governments have played on U.S. concerns by moving to curry favour with the United States to further their own domestic agendas and international standing," Zambelis wrote in a policy paper last year. "In doing so, they often highlight the alleged threat of al-Qaida or other brands of radical Islamist terrorism within their own borders."

The very idea of linking San Andres with Hezbollah is a stretch of the imagination, insists Bashir Harb, the secretary of the board of directors of the Centro Islamico, a mosque in downtown San Andres that is a spiritual home to hundreds of Lebanese Muslims who live here.

"Here nobody is involved in Mideast politics," said Harb, 25, whose parents left Lebanon's Bekaa Valley and came to Colombia in 1950, when the government declared San Andres a duty-free zone. "The islenos don't even know what's happening in the rest of Colombia, let alone the Middle East."

Claudia Marcela Delgado, the secretary of tourism for San Andres and the nearby island of Providencia, discount suggestions that Hezbollah maintains an active presence along Colombia's Caribbean coastline.

"One can assume that terrorist groups exchange information," Delgado said, "but I wouldn't say there's a strong presence here."

Arabs in Latin America's various free zones have come under increasing scrutiny since 1994, when Hezbollah agents financed by Lebanese sympathizers in the tri-border area were believed to have carried out the truck bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires. The blast killed 85 and injured more than 300.

This month, Interpol voted to issue arrest warrants for six men – five Iranians and one Lebanese – wanted for involvement in the AMIA attack.

The vote, taken at Interpol's 76th General Assembly in Morocco, follows Argentina's issuance last year of an international arrest warrant for former Iranian President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and eight others on charges of masterminding the AMIA bombing.

As evidence of Iran's hand in radical movements across the region, Karmon pointed to the formation a year ago of a new Iranian-backed organization, Hezbollah Latin America, which supposedly has branches in Argentina, Chile, El Salvador, Mexico and Venezuela.

"In all these countries there are Arab communities involved" in terrorist financing, Karmon said.

"There's a big Islamic centre in Buenos Aires connected to the Iranian Embassy," he said. "This infrastructure is kept alive for fundraising and recruitment. But the moment they decide they need to attack a target, or if the United States attacks facilities in Iran, Latin America could be one of the main areas for Iran – through Hezbollah – to retaliate against the United States or other western countries."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whom Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez has called "my brother," has visited Latin America three times this year. Ahmadinejad has opened new diplomatic missions in Latin America and initiated direct weekly flights between Caracas and Tehran.

Karmon says Chavez also has allowed Hezbollah to infiltrate the Guajira peninsula shared by Venezuela and Colombia, and convert the Wayuu Indian tribe to Islam.

"In Venezuela's case, the entire Wayuu Indian tribe simply converted to Islam because their chief, Teodoro Darnott, was a member of the pro-Chavez Grupo Nacionalista party," Karmon told JTA. "Last summer they put up a website in which they threaten to organize terrorist attacks against Zionists."

A look at that site brings up a large banner that reads "Bienvenidos – Allahu Akbar," which means "Welcome – God is Great," as well as colour photos of kaffiyeh-clad terrorists bearing AK-47 rifles under a bilingual Arabic-Spanish caption that translates, "The sweat of the workers is as holy and glorious as the blood of the martyrs."

But Zambelis doesn't see the newly minted Wayuu Muslims as much of a threat to anyone.

"Whoever's running that website is a crackpot," he said. "It's someone who is using the Hezbollah name to gather attention to his movement. There is absolutely no link between the real Hezbollah and that organization. Nobody takes him seriously."

Earlier this year, U.S. and Trinidadian authorities arrested four men in a plot to blow up fuel storage tanks at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport. The four allegedly had ties to an Islamic terrorist cell in Trinidad, and one of the suspects is a former member of the Guyanese Parliament.

But Karmon says his biggest worry is that Iran could deploy nuclear missiles in Venezuela, at the invitation of Chavez, in much the same way the Soviet Union sent nuclear weapons to Cuba, sparking the Cuban missile crisis in 1962.

"In my opinion, Chavez will continue to radicalize the regime internally," Karmon said. "I know Chavez from my activity as an adviser to the Israeli Anti-Semitism Monitoring Forum, and I think he is actually a proto-fascist."

"In the 1990s he co-operated with the most hateful right-wing Argentines. He's much worse than Fidel Castro, who was never an anti-Semite and never collaborated with these kinds of people."

Book reveals Sarkozy's Jewish-Greek roots

By JEAN COHEN

JTA

ATHENS — A new book detailing the Greek-Jewish roots of Nicolas Sarkozy shows political involvement for the French president's family.

According to Me, the Grandson of a Greek, a new book written by three Greek authors, two Sarkozy ancestors were members of the Greek Parliament in the early 20th century.

One of the authors is Leon Nar, a Jewish writer from Salonika, also known as Thessaloniki, the former hometown of Sarkozy's mother's family.

The book theorizes that Sarkozy's mother's family came to Salonika from the French region of Provence. Sarkozy's great-grandfather, Mordechai Mallah, a well-known Salonika jeweller, and his wife, Reina, had seven children. One was named Aaron, Sarkozy's grandfather.

At the age of 14, Aaron Mallah and his mother left for France, where Aaron studied medicine and served as a doctor during World War I.

It was in Paris that Aaron met the gentle nurse who would become his wife. In order to marry Adel Bouvieux, Aaron was baptized and converted to Catholicism, taking the name Benedict, or Benico. A daughter, Andree Mallah, married a Hungarian refugee named Paul Sarkozy. The couple had three sons, including Nicolas.

Paul Sarkozy left the family when Nicolas was 5 years old, and Benico took care of them. Nicolas, according to the book, was very attached to his grandfather, who used to tell his grandchildren stories from Salonika.

Until Benico's death in 1972, Nicolas Sarkozy and his brothers did not know they had Jewish roots. The Sarkozys brothers would learn the truth about their Jewish roots from their mother.

The authors said Benico did not tell his grandchildren about their Jewish roots to protect them, fearing anti-Semitism and another Holocaust, which killed most members of the Mallah clan.

In 1973, with his family facing financial difficulties, the 20-year-old Nicolas Sarkozy travelled to Salonika to sell his family's leftover property.

During a visit to Greece in July 2006, the Jewish community of Salonika honoured Sarkozy at a ceremony at the French Embassy in Athens.

The community gave Sarkozy, then France's interior minister, an album of his family tree going back to his great-great-grandfather, along with pictures of his ancestors. Sarkozy recognized some of the faces in the pictures from his own family albums.

At the event he met Lucy Saltiel, the wife of the president of the Jewish community of Salonika and a member of the Mallah family. Visibly moved, Sarkozy told the Jewish community members, "My roots are here."

Israel & the Jewish World

Israelis remember Sharon

Israelis marked two years since Ariel Sharon was incapacitated by a stroke. Marking the second anniversary of the Jan. 4, 2006, brain hemorrhage that ended the former prime minister's career and shook the Middle East, Israeli newspapers published never-before-seen pictures of Sharon as a child, while radio stations interviewed his aides and confidants. The comatose Sharon, 79, is in a long-term-care ward at Tel Hashomer hospital, where a select group of relatives and friends visit regularly, doctors said. He is sometimes propped up in front of the television, eyes open, though he is not responsive.

Olmert, Abdullah meet

Ehud Olmert met with Jordan's King Abdullah in an unannounced visit. Last Thursday's meeting in the Jordanian coastal town of Aqaba was arranged to co-ordinate the Israeli and Jordanian positions on regional issues ahead of U.S. President George W. Bush's visit to the area, according to Israel Radio. It was not announced in advance for security reasons. During the meeting, the Israeli prime minister told Abdullah that Israel will not build any new settlements nor appropriate any more land claimed by the Palestinians. Abdullah urged Israel and the Palestinians to honour their commitments to the current peace process. Jordan's largest political party, the Islamic Action Front, condemned Olmert's visit. Though Abdullah secretly visited former Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, he has not accepted numerous invitations from Olmert to visit Israel.

Israel retaliates

Israel retaliated for a rocket fired deep into the country, killing at least nine Palestinians in the Gaza Strip. Ground and air attacks last Thursday targeted buildings used by Palestinian terrorists. More than 30 Palestinians were wounded. Three of the dead were civilians. The army responded to an attack from Gaza by a rocket believed to be a Soviet-style "Grad" that hit northern Ashkelon, causing no damage or casualties. Israeli officials said it was the longest-range rocket ever fired from Gaza.

Labormay leave coalition

Ehud Barak hinted his Labor party could quit the Israeli government over the investigation into the Second Lebanon War. Barak, the defence minister and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's most important coalition partner, was asked in an interview whether he will quit the government after the Winograd Commission of inquiry publishes its second and final report on the summer 2006 offensive against Hezbollah in Lebanon. The report is expected at month's end. But Barak was circumspect about his plans. "I will sit quietly and think what the right thing to do is from the country's perspective, as well as how to do it, and when I decide, I'll do it," Barak told Israel Radio. Most political pundits believe his Labor party is in no rush to join the opposition, especially given current Israeli-Palestinian peace moves. But Barak had strong words against a Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee report last week that faulted the armed forces over the war but was sparing in its criticism of the government. He said the military's handling of its missions in Lebanon was "exemplary," but that it was limited by the planning and preparations made in Jerusalem. "I won't let the armed forces be a scapegoat," he said.

Israel Briefs

Ronen and a CIC team will be travelling to Israel with the minister.

Ronen told The C/JN that he is "encouraged" by what he sees as the purpose behind Bernier's trip.

"Our expectation is... that he will be conveying a message to the Saudis vis-a-vis the constructive role they can play in normalizing relations with Israel," Ronen said.

Ronen also reaffirmed the CIC's hope that Bernier will tell Abbas that Canada expects him to exercise rigid control over the financial aid it has pledged to the PA.

"As the Palestinians look towards enhanced civil society, institution-building, enhanced security and the like... we feel it's important for Palestinians to understand that the support from the international community, and from Canada in particular, is not unconditional," Ronen said.

Earlier this month, a spokesperson for the Department of Foreign Affairs told The C/JN that Canada would ensure that its promised funds "do not directly or indirectly benefit Hamas or other terrorist groups listed under Canadian law."

Ronen said the CIC is also looking forward to Canada re-affirming its "special relationship" with Israel and conveying the support that the Jewish state enjoys in Canada as it "tries to navigate a better situation on the ground and an optimistic future."

Calls by The C/JN to the Foreign Affairs Department for comment were not returned by deadline.

Celebrating 40 years of Excellence in Education 1967-2007

Israel & the Jewish World

Below the journalistic standard

By ANDREA LEVIN

David Landau, editor of Israel's Ha'aretz newspaper, made statements on Sept. 10 to the U.S. Secretary of State so vulgar, so outside the bounds of professional and social conduct, he'd be fired if he were heading up a mainstream American paper.

At a private dinner for Condoleezza Rice and some 20 journalists and academics in the home of U.S. Ambassador to Israel Richard Jones, Landau told the Secretary Israel wants to be "raped" by America - i.e., to have a political settlement forced on the nation.

Equally shocking, he admitted in the Jewish Week, which broke the story: "I told [Rice] that it had always been my wet dream to address the secretary of state" on the matter of coercing Israel.

Beyond the gross crudeness and lack of judgement in the words Landau chose in addressing a high American official lies, of course, the obscenity of the content - his claim that Israel desires, and deserves, to be raped. This perverse mind-set has also been reflected in Landau's consistent flouting of journalistic standards at Ha'aretz. While the paper includes fine reporters doing professional work, others are little more than propagandists, their writing filled with falsehood and incendiary distortion denigrating Israel.

Under the paper's current leadership - Landau and publisher Amos Shoken, who shares his editor's views - the stridency of attack has intensified. In both news stories and editorial commentary, for instance, Ha'aretz assails Israel as "apartheid" and ruthlessly oppressive.

This false, poisonous message is being spread globally in English on the publication's popular website. Rosters of incendiary columns by Ha'aretz writers are posted on virulent anti-Israeli and anti-Jewish Internet sites, included with relish as proof and validation of the criticisms of Israel's detractors.

Some of the most extreme Ha'aretz writers are also championed in more elevated locales, given prizes, quoted in the media and invited to conferences. Danny Rubenstein, Arab affairs reporter and editorial board member of Ha'aretz, spoke in August in Brussels at a UN event sponsored by its Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. In the midst of an assemblage demonizing his country and calling for boycotts against it, he rose to denounce Israel as an apartheid state.

Similarly, Ha'aretz columnist Gideon Levy excoriates Israel both in the newspaper and in public venues, regularly invoking the apartheid epithet. Likewise, columnist Amira Hass denounces what she terms Israel's "apartheid laws" and urges Israelis to join in toppling "the apartheid regime we have created here."

But indicative of the paper's disregard for factual accuracy in its supporting of this charge, or of other assertions advancing the publication's extreme political agenda, is the repeated claim by Levy and Hass that Israel maintains exclusive, "apartheid" Jewish-only roads in the West Bank. They have levelled this baseless charge repeatedly, sometimes citing absurdly as a specific example Route 443. Anyone driving that highway can readily observe the many Arab vehicles with Arab drivers and Arab passengers. A gas station on 443, owned and operated by the Israeli-Arab Hawaja family, serves Arabs and Jews who stop to fuel their cars and shop in the attached convenience store.

That is to say, Israelis of all religions and ethnicities, including Jews, Muslims, Christians, Bahais and any other background, can and do travel these roads.

When confronted with the facts on this particular, serious error, Amos Shoken conceded, "the term 'roads for Jews only,' which may be 'mathematically' incorrect, is fine with me because it describes the true nature and purpose of the roads."

The paper ferociously opposes the Israeli presence in the West Bank and in its zeal to pressure the government to take action it seeks, Shoken and Landau regularly print misinformation ostensibly demonstrating the evils of "occupation" and the fault of Israel in not making greater and speedier concessions.

But it is not only the Israeli presence in the West Bank that prompts distorted and erroneous criticism. Plentiful too are stories about the allegedly discriminatory, oppressive nature of Israeli society generally, including false charges about Arab property rights, building permits, economic development and more.

Ha'aretz is, in effect, used by its publisher and editor as a propaganda cudgel whose aim is to persuade both the Israeli consumer of the Hebrew edition and the global audience of the English version that Israeli wrongdoing and moral failure should be met with severe measures. In Landau's ugly formulation that action should have the traumatizing impact of a brutal sexual assault.

Hanoch Marmari, a previous editor, expressed far different views about the responsibility journalists such as those at Ha'aretz bear. At a conference on media coverage of the Arab-Israeli conflict, he warned that stories castigating Israel and carrying the "brand name" of Ha'aretz can appear to offer, in his words, "proof of Israel's profound and pervasive evil."

Regrettably, that message is just what Landau and Shoken seem more than eager to promote. The question is whether the Israeli public which is most directly imperiled by the defamation spread by the paper, will demand redress.

Don't get Deb Filler started

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Losing one's luggage is no laughing matter, but it's funny when it happens to comic Deb Filler.

"My bag was in transit for two days," she says. "I'm used to it... The trip before that, I'm checking my bags and I ask the airlines rep to send one suitcase to Jerusalem, one to Paris and the third to Tonga."

"The woman says, 'We can't send your bags to three different places!'"

"Why not?" I say. "You did it last time."

She laughs. "I just couldn't resist [the joke]." Barring the inconvenience of lost luggage, the Toronto-based comic says she was thrilled with her recent performances in Los Angeles and Las Vegas. "It was a terrific success. I didn't expect it to be so well received."

The show, Don't Get Me Started, will be performing in Toronto at the Al Green Theatre (Miles Nadal JCC) 8 p.m. Jan. 19 with an added matinee at 3 p.m. Jan. 20.

Filler notes that this is her first public stand-up performance in Toronto in five years. "I've been travelling so much I haven't had a chance to do a show here."

She describes Don't Get Me Started as a melange of buoyant Jewish songs, poignant stories, and cameo appearances of benchmark characters who have peppered her various solo shows.

Also included are some of the Jewish jokes she's been amassing for 25 years.

"I'm from the school that one has to master these great Jewish jokes and pass them on. I love the element of surprise in most Jewish jokes."

But the humour is also rooted in familiarity, she adds. "We recognize all those characters – the lady in the old age home, the five Jewish men playing cards, the Jewish mother on an El Al flight, you get the picture."

Filler calls the show "an evening of soul. I weave in stories of my life experiences."

Indeed, the New Zealand-born entertainer – she bills herself as the only Jewish comedian in her native country – comes by story telling naturally.

"Both my parents were great storytellers. They were a real inspiration to me. My mother fled Germany and arrived in colonial New Zealand in 1938. Her history informed her whole life experience and that was reflected in her stories."

"My father had more stories than anyone I've ever known. They weren't always happy stories because he was a survivor of several camps including Auschwitz. But he told stories with a sparkle in his eye. His memories before the war were happy ones."

Comedy was a part of Filler's life from the time she was seven, she recalls. "The emotional impact of being a first generation child of survivors inspired me to use humour to try to lessen my father's pain. He had a quirky sense of humour and he loved to laugh. I realized very early on that I could make him laugh. I tried to help lighten the load for the whole family."

"Miraculously, my father did not harbour much bitterness. He was a very special man. He was key to my sense of humour. Humour is universal and it's so liberating."

Her father followed his brother to Australia after the war. Her parents met there because her mother had been sent "to shop for a Jewish husband." The couple ran a bakery in Auckland, New Zealand, a city with around 2,500 Jews.

FORMER TORONTONIAN ELI MARCUS HAS BEEN 'TOUCHED BY THE BLUES'

Former Torontonian Eli Marcus ran the Fingerboard coffee house and open stage in Toronto in the late 1970s, and organized several blues and jazz concerts on the University of Toronto campus while completing a science degree. He also worked as a freelance writer and photographer for some local papers and magazines, usually writing about blues artists.

In 1981, Marcus immigrated to Israel, where he has remained active in the music scene, both on the stage and off. He has played on the kibbutz circuit and at clubs and festivals, some of which he has helped organize. He has also produced radio shows on the blues, written a monthly magazine column in Hebrew on the blues, and been active in the Blues For Peace organization.

Marcus recently published a second edition of Touched By the Blues, a book of stories he has collected from blues artists around the world; its subtitle is The Unsung Heroes of the Blues. For ordering information, visit the website <http://elimarcus.com>.

World's first Holocaust museum was founded by survivors

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

KIBBUTZ LOCHAMEI HAGETA'OT, Israel — The Ghetto Fighters' Museum in this kibbutz, one kilometre north of Acre and six kilometres south of Nahariya, is the granddaddy of all Holocaust museums.

Tamir Porter, an official in its overseas department, describes it as the world's first Holocaust museum.

It was founded in 1949 by survivors of ghettos and veterans of partisan bands to commemorate compatriots lost in the Holocaust.

Designed to evoke a spirit of rebellion rather than death, it received 120,000 visitors last year, many of whom were students.

Adjacent to the grand remains of a Roman aqueduct, the museum consists of two adjoining buildings — a functional box-like structure whose exhibits document the genocide, and Yad Layeled, a space-age cone-shaped building dedicated to the memory of the 1.5 million Jewish children killed by the Nazis and their collaborators.

The museum, whose attractive green spaces were laid out by the Jewish National Fund, gets its message across through impressive technology.

Upon entering the main building, a visitor is struck by a large plasma screen in which the names of 4,700 decimated Jewish communities are represented by floating white letters that alternately merge and fall away.

Additional screens relate the stories of victims and survivors, and these are often poignant.

Interconnected pavilions, covering a variety of themes, form the heart and soul of the museum.

The Warsaw Ghetto uprising, which broke out in the spring of 1943 and was mercilessly crushed by the Germans, is evoked through the medium of stark photographs of pain and resistance and of heart-rending testimonies.

Facing the armed might of the German army and police, the ghetto fighters had relatively few weapons at their disposal, and this fact is graphically conveyed in an exhibit in which primitive homemade bombs, pistols and rifles are displayed.

Further pavilions deal with the ghetto system, the deportation process and the concentration camps.

Still others concentrate on the mythical shtetl and on the rise of Adolf Hitler's fanatical regime through photographs, models and maps.

The art gallery, lit by natural light, contains more than 3,000 original pieces. Only Yad Vashem, in Jerusalem, has a larger collection. The drawings are by turns sorrowful and defiant, a microcosm of the artists' hellish ordeal.

One of the most interesting artifacts is the wood and glass booth in which the arch Nazi war criminal, Adolf Eichmann, sat passively as his trial unfolded in Jerusalem in 1961.

As you gaze upon the eerie exhibit, a rush of images flood the mind: Eichmann in Palestine in 1937 to assess the possibility of Jewish emigration from Europe; Eichmann in Vienna in 1938 to expel Jews from Austria; Eichmann in Wannsee in 1942 to participate in the infamous conference at which the Final Solution emerged; Eichmann in Buenos Aires in 1960 when he was kidnapped by Israeli security agents; Eichmann in Ramla in 1961 when he was hanged, the only person to be executed in Israel.

Yad Layeled, primarily intended for young visitors aged 10 and up, was opened in 1996 and is made up of two permanent exhibitions, a temporary exhibition and workshops for organized groups and families.

"The Story of the Jewish Child During the Holocaust" recounts the fate of the murdered children.

Overhead speakers and television monitors convey their experiences, while photographs, sacks and suitcases offer a glimpse of the uncertainty and terror that must have gripped them as the Nazi terror descended on the European continent.

"Janusz Korczak of the Children" honours an educator, author, humanitarian and hero who, in August 1942, sacrificed his life for the sake of the children in his Warsaw Jewish orphanage. Offered sanctuary on the Aryan side, he chose death instead, aligning himself with his charges, who were summarily deported to and gassed in Treblinka.

The man and his ideas are introduced through an interactive presentation.

"Following the Path of One Picture" delves into the testimonies of 22 child survivors and engages visitors in a research and discovery experience.

The workshops, at the end of the tour, enable visitors to express their feelings by way of arts and crafts, drama, creative writing and projects combining some or all of the above.

The museum's amphitheatre is located in a perfect setting, next to the Roman aqueduct and overlooking the green hills and plains of the Galilee.

Appropriately enough, the closing ceremony of Holocaust Remembrance Day, an annual event, takes place in this theatre.

Novel based on unknown origins of Israel

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The Witness Tree, a new novel by John Loftus, and co-written by Canadian author Brendan Howley, delves into what for most is the unknown background to the origins of the modern State of Israel.

Loftus, who spoke at a book signing in Toronto recently, described the book as "a murder story, a love story and a detective story."

The historical novel is about a famous American family, the Dulles family: John Foster Dulles became the secretary of state, and Allan Dulles became the head of the CIA. But the star of the book is their sister, Eleanor.

Her government career began in Franklin Roosevelt's social security administration, then moved onto wartime intelligence where she had security clearances for state department information, enabling her to go into classified vaults and discover well-hidden secrets.

It was there she found out that in the 1930s and '40s her brothers were lawyers for Hitler's bankers. They had moved investment capital from Wall Street, which built the Third Reich from the ground up. They also had Canadian business partnerships that traded with Nazis, says Loftus.

Eleanor acquired blackmail information on one man in particular, Nelson Rockefeller, who was to become governor of New York in 1959, and then the vice-president under Gerald Ford. During World War II, Rockefeller was the chief of intelligence in Latin America – but had been engaged financially with the Nazis.

A few days before the UN Palestine partition vote in November 1947, a test resolution, conducted by the Arab nations, was held. The Zionists won, but nowhere near the two-thirds majority needed. If the votes didn't change within the next three days, there would not have been an Israel.

The turnaround came when the Zionists played their trump card: Eleanor Dulles gladly handed over damning documentation to Zionist activists, who presented it personally to Nelson Rockefeller.

"Giving aid and comfort to the enemy during a time of war is considered to be treason. So he called everybody he knew, and in three days he turned around every vote in Latin America, coaxing them to either abstain, or vote in favour of Israel," says Loftus. These new votes helped break the impasse.

"I think it's fair to say that without Eleanor Dulles, there would never have been a State of Israel. She was a quiet heroine."

Loftus himself is a U.S. intelligence expert, who has had high security clearances while in the U.S. Justice Department, and worked with NATO, the Israeli army and CIA. Much of what is contained in his new book, his fourth, could only have been acquired through his intelligence community network, he says. He describes The Witness Tree as being like the film Schindler's List in terms of the story being true, but the dialogue and some characters were fictionalized or composites.

"I'm hoping that a new generation will understand this time of history a little bit better," says Loftus. "I want it to be especially for people who don't know a lot about World War II, or the 1930s, to get the story across easily."

Though the Nazis were defeated in Europe, their terrifying legacy survives with those who wish to harm the Jewish people, such as some dictators in the Arab world.

For example, Loftus says that as an Arab Nazi reared Saddam Hussein – and given Saddam's financial gifts to Palestinian homicide bombers' families – it wouldn't be a stretch to imagine that Saddam would make an effort to maximize damage with the pursuit of deadlier artillery.

In fact, lately Loftus has even more secrets to share, pertinent to the Jewish people – intelligence documents and other previously classified information reveal the invasion of Iraq may have prevented Saddam from continuing an ongoing trade in chemical, biological and even nuclear weapons, a subject which Loftus elaborates on his website. Nuclear materials, he maintains, made their way to Syrian hands, or were still in Iraq when coalition forces invaded, but spirited out, right under the nose of the coalition troops.

He also suggests the recent mysterious air strike by Israel against Syria was intended to destroy the facility carrying out this nuclear work.

Remembering A Lost Hero

The Holocaust Centre of Toronto invites the community to commemorate Raoul Wallenberg Day with a special screening of Rosenstrasse

Winner of the 2004 David Di Donatello Award for Best European Film. Selected for the Venice, American Film Institute and Toronto International Film Festivals.

In Berlin, in 1943, on a street called "Rosenstrasse," Jewish men were rounded up for deportation to concentration camps and certain death. Based on a true story, their "Aryan" wives stood up to the Nazis and protested successfully to save the lives of their Jewish husbands and sons. The legacy of these women is one of courageous action in the face of tyranny and injustice.

Filler trained as a singer and school teacher and taught for three years before becoming a full-time writer/performer. She is currently a guest teacher in the theatre and dance department at Brown University.

She lived in New York City for 14 years before moving to Toronto in 1997 to be the executive producer of a feature film of her show Punch Me in the Stomach.

In 2002, Filler performed another one-woman show, Filler Up!, all over the world. "I was sold out for eight-week runs in London, Sydney and Berlin. In Auckland we sold out a large theatre for three weeks. That really meant a lot to me because it was my hometown."

She did Filler Up! for the first time in New York City last spring. "I was humbly honoured by the positive response. New Yorkers have so much choice for theatre. It was really an honour for me to get that kind of reaction."

Filler is currently co-writing and producing a new show I Only Laugh When It Hurts – My Life with the Martz Sisters. The research involves collecting Jewish jokes, she explains.

"I already have 500 pages of great Jewish jokes. Real classics. The play is a work in progress. I've showcased it to a few backers and everyone seems pretty excited about it."

Tickets for Don't Get Me Started can be purchased from the T.O. TIX booth at Yonge and Dundas or on line at totix.ca. For more information call 416-535-4556.

Torontonian compiled Israeli music CD for British label

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The C/JN

A British record label saluting the music of Israel? If that sounds far-fetched, in light of the current anti-Israel climate in Europe, it's not, as I discovered last year when I came across The Rough Guide to the Music of Israel (2006). Even more interesting, Dan Rosenberg, the compiler of this CD, and many others in the Rough Guide series, just happens to be a Torontonians.

The Rough Guide CDs, which are put out by World Music Network, are dedicated to the promotion of the music of various countries and genres from around the world. To date, since the first Rough Guide disc came out in 1994, there have been more than 150 record releases, encompassing everything from the music of Tanzania, Peru, Hawaii and Canada, among many other countries and regions, to explorations of musical genres and sub-genres such as soca, fado, Chicago blues, bhangra and klezmer and everything in between.

The discs, which usually mix the tunes of established artists, up-and-coming stars and musicians not known outside of their own countries are rightfully considered the cream of the compilation crop in the incredibly multi-faceted world-music musical scene. And the American – born Rosenberg, who moved to Toronto in 2001 when his wife, Anna Shternshis, accepted a teaching post at the University of Toronto – has had a lot to do with the Rough Guides' success and acclaimed reputation.

"When I said let's do Israel," Rosenberg says, "there was a little gulp at the other end of the [phone] line, but I explained about the music that's there and essentially, too, that this isn't going to be a CD of Meir Kahane [founder of the New York-based Jewish Defense League] supporters."

Elaborating on that provocative comment, he explains, "Well, you have to do that because that's the attitude [about Israel] there. [But] it didn't take much selling because Phil Stanton, the guy who runs the label, he knows Chava Alberstein and a number of the other artists [in Israel]."

(The Rough Guides have also featured Israeli musicians on other discs such as the recent Planet Rock and Volumes 1 and 3 of their World Music series.)

The Israeli CD that the 40-year-old Rosenberg put together features 14 artists, including longtime stars such as Alberstein, the late Ofra Haza and Arik Einstein, as well as hot newer acts such as Idan Raichel's Project and Tea Packs. Not coincidentally, I suspect, Putumayo World Music, the other significant world music label, put out their own 12-track Israeli disc in 2007; it's a testament to the incredible richness and diversity of the Israeli music scene that the two CDs only had two performers, Idan Raichel and Tea Packs, in common.

Rosenberg is especially proud of his perspicacity in choosing to highlight songwriter/ keyboardist Idan Raichel on the disc before Raichel gained an international following with his Ethiopian-influenced debut album, Idan Raichel's Project. "Nobody had ever heard of him [outside of Israel]," Rosenberg says.

And sometimes luck, as well as musical knowledge, plays a part in making a compiler like Rosenberg, who typically spends about a year creating a disc, look good. "When I put together The Rough Guide to Bluegrass," says Rosenberg, "I included many of my favourite artists like Alison Krauss, Ralph Stanley, Rhonda Vincent and others. As it turned out, my compilation hit stores days before [the Coen brothers' movie] O Brother, Where Art Thou? was released in theatres [in 2000]."

Dan Rosenberg

Referring to the soundtrack of the film, he points out that "both CDs happened to feature many of the same artists. So what I should be doing," he says with a laugh, "is encouraging the Coen brothers to do a movie full of music from Israel, Venezuela or Belize."

Rosenberg, who majored in molecular biology and worked for a biotech software company before finding his true calling, does express some frustration in having to reduce the music of any particular country, such as Canada, to just one disc. "I kind of wish these could be two- to three-disc sets but the market being what it is, nobody wants to pay thirtysomething dollars [for a CD]," he says.

'When I said
let's do Israel,' Rosenberg says,
'there was a little gulp at the other end of the [phone] line'

He did get to do a double disc in 2003, for Rounder Records, titled The Hidden Gate: Jewish Music From Around the World, dividing the compilation, roughly, into Ashkenazi and Sephardi, and other non-Ashkenazi music.

Next up for Rosenberg in 2008 are two more Rough Guides on klezmer music (he wasn't involved with the excellent 2001 Rough Guide to Klezmer). The Rough Guide to the Klezmer Revival "will feature a number of Russian artists who are involved in the klezmer revival in Europe, as well as artists here leading the revival in North America," he says. It will showcase "artists that fuse jazz, hip hop, bluegrass and a variety of other styles with klezmer." He's also preparing Rough Guide discs on Romanian, Hungarian and Russian Gypsy music.

And while the world-music record scene isn't quite as vibrant as it was in its heyday in the '90s – "there were more music people in the business than there are now just because economically the record business is not what it used to be" – his is still a dream job, Rosenberg says. Though with two kids to help raise, he can't afford to go to different countries and personally research his CDs as he used to do.

"It's loads and loads of fun [but] there's times you wish you had more hours in the day."

A NOSE FOR EXOTIC FRUITS

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is curious about a new fruit. He and his wife Aliza last week visited the Vulcani Agricultural Research Institute in Beit Dagan where they were presented with a variety of exotic fruit and vegetables from the Far East and South America that are now also growing in Israel.

Prolific scorer 'Chick' Zamick starred in England

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The province of Manitoba can lay claim to a number of former National Hockey League stars such as the Chicago Blackhawks' Bill Mosienko; the Boston Bruins' Tom Johnson; Andy Bathgate of the N.Y. Rangers; Terry Sawchuk of the Detroit Red Wings; and Toronto Maple Leafs' Bill Juzda and Bill Ezinicki.

All of the aforementioned, of course, gained prominence because they rose to stardom in the best hockey league in the world. One other lesser-known skater from the prairies however, a Jewish Manitoban who died this past fall, took his act overseas and became a household name, if not a legend, in Britain.

The man in question, Victor "Chick" Zamick, 81, died on October 8, 2007 in London, England. Jewish folk who grew up in Winnipeg's north-end were quite familiar with the Zamick clan.

As the story goes, all the kids were called "Chick" because there were twelve Chiclets in a package of chewing gum and there were a similar number of offspring in the family whose parents came originally from Ukraine. Many of them excelled in sports, whether it was hockey, football, track and field, softball, soccer, boxing, gymnastics or baseball.

Victor, a member of the Manitoba Hockey Hall of Fame since 1995, became the most well known athlete of the family. The Winnipeg-born centre, who started playing hockey at age 15, spent two seasons in the Manitoba Junior Hockey League, mainly with the Winnipeg Monarchs, and then went east to play with the St. Catherine Teepees of the (Junior 'A') Ontario Hockey Association. He also earned a tryout with the American Hockey League (AHL) Cleveland Barons.

It was in 1947 that Alex Archer, who was born in West Ham, London but moved to Winnipeg when he was three, encouraged and recruited young Victor to join him abroad. Archer was already enjoying a successful hockey career across the pond.

Being only five-foot-eight and 175 lbs., Zamick saw little future for himself as a small man in the rough and tough game of Canadian hockey. He made his way to England where he starred primarily with the Nottingham Panthers, now of the British Elite League.

The numbers the diminutive speedster compiled in Jolly Old England would make any coach salivate. He won seven scoring titles, compiling 778 career goals with the Panthers while adding 645 assists in 624 games. He made the first all-star team seven times and the second team three times. Zamick is a member of the British Hockey Hall of Fame.

In his best season, his second last with Nottingham in 1954-55, Zamick scored 94 goals and added 75 assists in just 62 games.

Zamick was known in some circles as the Gordie Howe of British hockey; others compared him with Rocket Richard.

Bob Goring, a Manitoban who is the father of one-time NHL star Butch Goring and who played in the British League around the same time as Victor, confirmed that Chick was indeed a legitimate talent. He said Zamick's diminutive stature didn't put him at a disadvantage, as his skating speed plus the fact he was extremely elusive made him hard to check.

In 1958 Zamick took a coaching position in Geneva, Switzerland that lasted three years. Afterwards, he returned to play a number of games with the Wembley Lions. After he retired from hockey, he opened several businesses, including a dry cleaner, sauna and squash courts.

Zamick is survived by his wife Vera, four children, and six grandchildren.

POST PATTERN:

- HC Lausanne of the Elite Swiss League now has a pair of Jewish skaters who played last season in the AHL. Cory Pecker, a one-time Manitoba Moose forward who played with the Binghamton Senators in the 2006-07 campaign, has recently joined former Grand Rapids forward Eric Himelfarb. Both players played junior hockey in the Ontario Hockey League, where they were prolific scorers who never shied away from the rough stuff. They have good speed and were sixth-round NHL draft picks: Himelfarb by Les Canadiens and Pecker by the Flames.

- Left winger Adam Henrich, a 2002 second round selection of Tampa Bay, has been promoted from the East Coast Hockey League where he was scoring up a storm with 10 goals and 10 helpers in 12 games with the Wheeling Nailers. Now in Norfolk of the AHL he was recently voted "Player of the Week," recording four goals and an assist in four games.

Peer knocks out Safina but loses in tournament semi-final

CJN news services

Shahar Peer, Israel's top women's tennis player, lost in the semi-finals of Australia's Women's Hardcourts tennis tournament to Viktoriya Azarenka of Belarus.

The 18-year-old Azarenka, ranked 30, upset fifth seed Peer 6-4 6-2 to reach her third WTA Tour final.

Peer had saved five match points in beating defending champion Dinara Safina to get to the semi-finals. But the effort in getting past the Russian took its toll on the Israeli and Azarenka took full advantage to win in 68 minutes.

Peer has not won a tournament in more than one and a half years.

She avenged last year's loss to Safina in the tournament's semi-finals by defeating the Russian player, ranked 15 in the world, 6-4, 1-6, 6-7 (10-8).

Azarenka reached the semi-finals after winning in three sets against the Czech Republic's Dominika Cibulkova in the quarter-finals.

Our divorce laws must be changed

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

The system of divorce as prescribed by Jewish law is fundamentally flawed. There is simply no other way to judge a set of rules that grants such overwhelming power to the male divorcé who must grant his former wife a get, a Jewish divorce, if she is to continue living a Jewish life of any significance.

Without a get, a divorced woman may not remarry a Jew in a religious ceremony, and any future children she gives birth to are automatically deemed Jewish outcasts. It is bad enough that Jewish law considers a fair balance of power unnecessary. What's worse is that the modern-day rabbinic arbiters have not recognized the need to overturn the stance of our earliest lawmakers on this issue.

There can be no alternate opinion on the subject of Jewish divorce laws. Even those who would argue that Jewish law was never meant to be "feminist," that there is a paternalistic foundation to God's Torah, have no grounds to argue in favour of the status quo. The granting of a get isn't about empowering females, it is, simply, about protecting one's basic human rights.

Considering how unwilling Jewish lawmakers have been to change the laws of divorce, many people will be celebrating the Supreme Court of Canada's recent ruling in favour of Stephanie Bruker, a Jewish woman from Montreal who sued her husband for damages because he had refused to give her a get in the 15 years after their 1980 civil divorce. Previously, the Quebec Court of Appeal had decided it had no jurisdiction over a case whose essential nature was based on a separate set of religious laws. But the Supreme Court reversed that decision, awarding Bruker $47,500 in damages at the end of December.

Long-suffering ex-wives and champions of balancing the powers of the sexes in Jewish law are no doubt celebrating this ruling. I don't think there's any reason to consider the Bruker case a victory. Consider this: the court's decision doesn't mean that Jewish divorce laws have been altered, only that the risk of facing a lawsuit might force those few odious men to reconsider if they would otherwise withhold a get from their ex-wives without fear of punishment. But the basic weakness of the Jewish law remains exposed.

If anything, the Bruker ruling should cause us all to lower our heads in shame. We – Judaism – lost. We knew there was a problem and yet did nothing to fix it. And to make things worse, lawmakers outside of our community were forced to use their rules to fix our rules. If laws of Jewish divorce are deplorable, we are all the more so for allowing them to stand, even as an outside force threatened to change the rules unilaterally.

Worse still, I fear we may look back on the Supreme Court's ruling on the get as the moment when we lost our ability to self-govern based on our own set of rules. Now that the court has seen fit to wade into religious waters, what, for example, will happen when someone claims that ritual circumcision constitutes a cruel punishment?

And all this because we were too weak, too pathetic, to fix our own problems, too afraid of change, even when we knew that change was desperately necessary.

The Supreme Court decision should be a wake-up call to all Jews – rabbis and laypeople alike – to act immediately to deal with the agunah issue. The shame of inaction can now never be undone. Those in charge of our system of laws must have the courage to institute change, even at the expense of tradition and written law, to emancipate Jewish women from the tyranny of our divorce system. The rest of us must show unflinching resolve to force our leaders to make those changes – not only to keep the civil courts out of our traditions, but for the sake of those Jewish women whom we continue to fail.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

TORONTO DAILY STAR

TORONTO, FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1908—SIXTEEN PAGES

Some Personages Involved in the Troubles of the Hebrew Congregation of B'Nai Abraham Brought Before Judge Winchester in the Court of General Sessions.

By BILL GLADSTONE

TROUBLE AT B'NAI ABRAHAM: It has been exactly a century since a bitter dispute at Toronto's old B'nei Abraham congregation spilled onto the front page of the Toronto Daily Star, as drawn by artist C. W. Jefferys in this January 1908 illustration. When the congregation split into two factions, both claimed the Torah scroll as their own. Faced with a problem that might have stymied Solomon, the judge locked the scroll in a vault at City Hall for a month while determining its rightful owners.

"Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God"

-Book of Ruth (Judaism's first convert)

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Last week, I wrote Part I of "And Then I Became a Jew," based on an interview I conducted with Bruce Cowley, a Torontonion who converted to Judaism from Baptism. "Conversion," Bruce said, "is not often discussed openly. I hope this article makes people think and consider what it means to make the choice of becoming a Jew." I concur. Here is more of what Bruce told me.

How do other Jews treat me? Jews are always interested in my choice to become a Jew. We are self-reflective. We're always questioning our existence.

I'm very comfortable with the questioning. I don't think I've ever had a negative reaction from a Jew or a non-Jew about converting. The most uncomfortable questions I have been asked are: "Do you feel Jewish?" or "Are you really Jewish?" These are legitimate questions.

URBAN WRITER

What's the experience of the Jewish experience. We hold a unique place in the world, and it's natural for Jews to ask.

I liked the inherent debate within Judaism that encourages questioning the existence of God and the behaviour of people.

Of course I feel Jewish. Being Jewish is being vibrant. To be Jewish reminds me more often that I am part of the human race. In Judaism, the focus is on where we are today, not in the future world; it's on our relationships with other people and the issues of everyday life.

It's feeling your place in the world and seeing what other human beings are up to.

Within Judaism there is an obligation to help our fellow human beings. I don't know if people understand the importance of giving. What's good about it is that you're putting yourself out there – there is some discomfort, so it's got to be good.

My concept of Jesus? Well, my beliefs were a little underdeveloped, and you must remember I was under the influence of my parents. My belief in Jesus as my saviour was never based on debate. Debate was not encouraged around the issue. I therefore never felt free enough to embrace that belief. It was simply expected that I would.

I have three children, two boys and a girl. They tease me sometimes over how I might mispronounce a Hebrew word. But my "ch" is good.

I would be a total hypocrite if I said I don't want my kids to marry non-Jews, but the truth is I want them to marry Jews.

I converted through the Conservative movement. An Orthodox rabbi once suggested I convert through Orthodoxy. My response was that I don't need to. I'm Jewish. The rabbi responded: "Don't think of it as converting again. Think of it as being on an airplane. I want to move you from economy up to business class."

I didn't want to convert to simply keep my future in-laws happy. It had to feel good to me.

We know people who converted for marriage, and some of them are good Jews. I know someone else who said she could no longer give up certain things and did not feel comfortable calling herself a Jew anymore. The children are still raised as Jews.

I'm reminded every day how lucky I am to be Jewish. It offers me more opportunities to reflect on my behaviour and my status as a human being. When I wasn't Jewish, I didn't think about these things as often.

Being Jewish gives me more reason to keep my eyes open. It's part of being a Jew.

Please discuss this with my blog: <http://avrumrosensweigideas.blogspot.com> or e-mail me at avrum@veahavta.org.

And then I became a Jew – Part 2

MDA Chapter Opens

VANCOUVER — A new branch of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA) has opened in Vancouver, making it the fifth city in Canada with a chapter, along with Montreal, Toronto, Edmonton and Calgary. Chair Richard Wenner told the Jewish Independent that the chapter aims to raise more than $100,000 to buy a new ambulance for Magen David Adom, Israel's equivalent to the Red Cross, in time for Israel's 60th birthday in May.

Asper Bio Coming

TORONTO — Veteran Canadian journalist Peter C. Newman will write a book about the late Winnipeg businessman Izzy Asper, publisher HarperCollins announced last week. The unauthorized biography of Asper, the philanthropist and founder of CanWest Global Communications who died in 2003 at 71, will be published next fall. "Newman will be writing with the assistance of, but not the approval of, the Asper family," HarperCollins said.

CJC Mourns Lawyer

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, paid tribute last week to one of their most officers, lawyer Marvin Stark, a professor emeritus of business at Simon Fraser University, who died Jan. 8 in Vancouver. Stark, a member of CJC Pacific region's officers committee for many years and vice-chair of its board of directors from 1992 to 1995, will be remembered "for his significant contributions to public policy issues and, in particular, aboriginal justice. He will be greatly missed," the CJC said in a statement.

The vitamins have also been similarly certified as halal by

Don't Court 'Israel Lobby,' Candidates Told

LOS ANGELES — U.S. presidential candidates aren't helping Israel by offering unconditional support, the authors of a controversial book on the Israel lobby say.

John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, who wrote The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy, wrote in the Los Angeles Times that the candidates' devotion to Israel, including support for more than $3 billion in annual foreign aid, and their seeming inability to criticize the Jewish state is out of fear of losing the support of the "Israel lobby."

"Such pandering is hardly surprising, because contenders for high office routinely court special interest groups, and Israel's staunchest supporters — the Israel lobby, as we have termed it — expect it," they wrote in the Times. "Politicians do not want to offend Jewish Americans or 'Christian Zionists,' two groups that are deeply engaged in the political process."

Mearsheimer and Walt criticized all the candidates in the 2008 race of bidding to be Israel's best friend.

"These candidates, however, are no friends of Israel," they said. "They are facilitating its pursuit of self-destructive policies that no true friend would favour."

the Islamic Society of North America, the company said.

Jews Closely Knit

VANCOUVER — Jews are the most closely knit ethnic group in the Vancouver area, a new federal report says. Multiculturalism on the Ground, a Heritage Canada study that looks at where cultural groups settle in major cities, found Jews live in a tight cluster on Vancouver's west side, which it attributed to the fact many Jews want to be close to shuls, CBC News reported. The second-most-concentrated group are Iranians, located in the city's North Shore area. Chinese people, the area's largest group, are fourth on the list.

New federation president focuses on education costs

Organization has evolved from previous generation, says Koschitzky

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

David Koschitzky says he thinks it's important for people to recognize that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is "not their father's federation."

The organization – of which Koschitzky became president in late November – has evolved, he said in a recent interview. UJA Federation is the umbrella and main funder for Toronto-area Jewish agencies through its annual UJA campaign, which also funds overseas Jewish needs.

Koschitzky, 49, thinks a lot of people see the federation "as a gigantic organization with lots of money – like the Jewish government."

But that is "a poor perception," he said in a recent interview. One reason is that the federation does not tax community members, which means it does not have the ability to decide how much money will be available, he explained.

Koschitzky, who was born in Calgary and moved to Toronto with his family after Grade 6, sees the federation as "an old-style switchboard operator" who connects "donors who want to give money to specific causes, with recognized agencies."

In Koschitzky's first speech as federation president, he said his number 1 priority would be "to find solutions so that the middle class will not be squeezed out of the ability to provide their children a Jewish education."

David Koschitzky

Ultimately, he said, "the long-term solution is government funding." Despite the results of October's provincial election in Ontario, when the Progressive Conservatives under leader John Tory were trounced for their support of the idea, Koschitzky has not given up.

"We're the only province in Canada that has a major Jewish population that doesn't have funding," said Koschitzky, a father of five who first became involved in his children's day school and in federation while living in Chicago from 1983 to 1995.

"It's happened in every other province. I believe it has to happen here."

"Do I think it's possible? When women went to get the vote the first time, they were defeated... Bottom line: they got the vote."

In the meantime, options for lowering the cost of education include decreasing teachers' salaries – which he is "firmly against" – and maintaining or increasing class size, Koschitzky said. He added that he would "challenge anyone" who believes there is much waste in the system.

As well, the federation recently announced $2 million in additional annual funding for elementary schools that provide tuition subsidies. It is also planning to introduce a $100-million endowment fund that would provide an estimated $5 million annually for education.

However, Koschitzky noted, "it will not meet the needs of giving every Jewish child an education."

"The average family is giving up vacations, cars, and standards of life that other people at their level expect."

Koschitzky said that there are also sacrifices on the part of the federation. "We have to put a handle on costs. We don't have the luxury of funding every type of school people would like. [Every] school has to show economic feasibility."

WELLINGTON WEST

Wellington West Capital Inc. a member of CIBC MIRA

Each year, for the past three years around this time, The CJN has publicized some of the key findings of the annual report of the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI).

Based in Jerusalem, the institute is an independent think-tank whose mission "is to help assure a thriving future for the Jewish people and Judaism by engaging in professional strategic thinking and planning on short and long-term issues of primary concern to the Jewish people, with special attention to critical choices that have a significant impact on the future... based on deep commitment to the future of the Jewish people with Israel as its core state."

The very long and large language of the mission statement attests to the high-minded conviction and seriousness of purpose with which the thinkers of the institute apply themselves. They are dedicated, simply and entirely, to the well-being and betterment of the Jewish people "in all their habitations," to borrow a biblical reference.

The scholars at the institute are a distinguished group. Far-seeing Prof. Yehzekel Dror is the founding president of JPPPI. Former U.S. ambassador Dennis Ross is chairman of the institute's board and renowned journalist Avinoam Bar-Yosef is its managing director.

The members of the board, among whom is Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, include some of the most recognized intellectual and activists in the wide Jewish world, all experienced in government, academia, the private sector and Jewish communal life.

The JPPPI's annual report is a much-anticipated multiple-use document. It provides a macro summary of the state of the Jewish world and a micro snapshot of its constituent communities.

It also identifies issues, problems, challenges and opportunities that they suggest should appear on a policy-making agenda of communal organizations around the world.

Greater Toronto Area

Thinking of the Jewish future

This year's report is somewhat of a departure from previous years. As Ross explains in his foreword, "[T]his year's assessment differs from its predecessors in several respects. First, it focuses heavily on the effect of the 2006 war in Lebanon not only on Israel, but also on the largest Jewish community outside of Israel, the Jewish community in the United States. Second, rather than providing an overview of the changing status of different Jewish communities internationally, this year's assessment analyzes a number of societal aspects and developments in leading Diaspora communities and in Israel. And third, by outlining socio-economic, migration, family and religious patterns, it offers insight into cultural directions and trends among the Jewish people."

This week and next, I will highlight some of the key observations that appear in the JPPPI Annual Assessment 2007: Social Aspects.

The underlying assumption of the report, as explained at the outset by Prof. Chaim I. Waxman, Senior Fellow at JPPPI, the project head of the report (and a contributor to the 5767 Rosh Hashanah supplement in The CJN) is the "perception that the notion of the Jewish people comprised of Jewish communities around the world with a core state in Israel is one which shows signs of weakening and... is increasingly expressed by the more deeply affiliated members of organized Jewish communities as well as by some Israeli leaders."

It soon becomes apparent that the sense of a weakening notion of a worldwide, but Israel-centric, Jewish people is, in truth, a sense of the weakening connection between the Jews of the United States and the State of Israel. Hence, Waxman explains, "this year's assessment looks at some societal aspects of the largest Diaspora Jewish community, with some attention also on other Diaspora communities." (my emphasis)

On page 12 of this issue, we have published the chart from the report that depicts "selected indicators of world Jewry." In effect, it is as up-to-date as possible a snapshot of the worldwide Jewish community.

A number of facts immediately leap off the page.

- The population of world Jewry hovers simply at a figure just barely more than 13 million. It will rise very slowly past that figure even after more than a decade. In fact, the number of Jews in the United States will decline over the same period of time. The number of Jews in Canada will increase but minimally.
- Only three Jewish communities are expected to experience an increase in population by the year 2020: Israel, Canada and Mexico. (And Asia, but by a minimal projection of 1,000.)
- Slightly more than a third of American Jewry have ever visited Israel, while nearly two-thirds of Canadian Jewry have travelled there.

Next week I will tease out some of the Diaspora societal issues that concern the writers of the report.

The report can be viewed on the JPPPI website.

B'nai Brith Canada moves to oust dissidents

Members to fight proposed expulsions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) will hold disciplinary hearings on the proposed expulsions of more than a dozen members – including one who has been part of the organization for 68 years – for conduct it says is “unbecoming a member of BBC and contrary to the best interests of our organization.”

Notices were mailed to the members in late November 2007 indicating that an executive committee had determined their membership in the fraternal organization will end, but leaving open an appeal to a disciplinary committee that will convene at 6:30 p.m. on Jan. 21 at BBC's Toronto office at 15 Hove St.

Some of the members, including Harvey Crestohl, a past BBC president, and Henry Gimpel, past chair of the Toronto regional co-ordinating committee – as well as Lloyd Lindsay and 93-year-old Lou Ronson, the organization's longest living member – have retained lawyer Rochelle Cantor to represent them.

In the past, they have raised concerns over corporate governance at BBC, which they claim suffered from a lack of transparency and centralized control of decision-making, as well as a failure to make available audited financial statements at several annual general meetings (AGMs) and the purported passage of a new constitution that they contend was defeated by the members at the 2005 AGM.

Most of the members contacted by The CJN indicated they would contest the removal, but one of them, former national president Morley Wolfe, has resigned over BBC's treatment of Ronson, its longest serving member.

Wolfe said he was disgusted that BBC would move to strip Ronson of his membership, given that he was instrumental in developing its League for Human Rights and was named one of B'nai Brith's most outstanding 150 volunteers in its history.

In a letter to BBC, Wolfe called the proposed expulsion of Ronson “shameful and intolerable.”

“To commit this distinguished gentleman to the ordeal of expulsion in his 93rd year, while he is still mourning the recent death of his wife, is not only mean-spirited but continues to reflect the lack of respect and concern BBC has for its longest-serving members,” Wolfe wrote.

Crestohl, a lawyer, was scathing in his denunciation of the expulsion attempt, saying it was little more than a bid by BBC's head office to stifle legitimate concerns. “They want to go after us so they can intimidate the rest into keeping quiet,” he said.

Identical letters sent to Lindsay and Gimpel, signed by Rochelle Wilner, chair of BBC's disciplinary committee, state the reason for expulsion. She indicated that the committee “has received a complaint regarding your conduct as part of a group calling itself ‘Concerned Members of BBC (CMOBBC).’”

“The complaint charges that your conduct is unbecoming a member of BBC and contrary to the best interests of our organization. The remedy sought is an order of expulsion.”

Attached to the letters was a copy of a resolution passed by BBC's executive committee. The resolution alleges that the CMOBBC circulated documents at the June 11, 2006, annual general meeting (AGM) regarding matters that were before a B'nai Brith International (BBI) court of appeal, which was hearing a case alleging that BBC had improperly adopted the new constitution. The documents, the allegation states, “contained serious and unsubstantiated allegations against the organization and leadership.”

The executive committee further alleges that before and after a ruling was rendered by the appeal court, CMOBBC circulated e-mails that included “defamatory allegations of wrongdoing, both financial and otherwise.”

The executive committee noted that the BBI appeal court issued a gag order “requiring that the parties not discuss this appeal outside this forum.” It also said the conduct of those subject to expulsion has been “harmful to the organization's best interests and contrary to its mission and the standard of behaviour required of its members.”

Frank Dimant, BBC's national executive vice-president, said members' concerns over corporate governance were addressed (on July 20, 2007) by BBI's court of appeal – a forum chosen by the dissidents. “We do comply with all the necessary items for a corporation, and, quite frankly, I find it strange that members who went through the process of asking BBI court to rule on it” are unhappy with the decision. “It's the highest court on it. That's the end of the matter.”

We take pride ... in your success.

The start of a new year is often a time for reflection and review. Looking back over 2007, it's impossible to not feel proud of the outstanding achievements of the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund (RMIF).

Investors from Jewish communities across Canada are entrusting their money to the Fund in record amounts. In December 2007 alone, the RMIF accepted new investments of over $11 million, with 92 existing investors increasing their investments in the Fund. This infusion of capital boosts the Fund's holdings to over $400 million.

While these figures are impressive in and of themselves, what's even more impressive is the underlying message: Investors have confidence in the Fund - in its proven performance, its solid results, and its strong management. It's largely this confidence - combined with the Fund's outstanding track record - that is responsible for the RMIF's ongoing success and growth. Our clients consistently recommend the Fund to their friends and family members, enabling the investor base to grow from within, through informed referrals from satisfied clients. Unlike investments available today through brokers and financial consultants, no fees or commissions are payable to anyone for referral to the RMIF.

This investor confidence is particularly remarkable given the continued instability and uncertainty in the marketplace. That's why investors looking for an investment with low volatility, predictable returns, and a regular monthly income stream are naturally attracted to the RMIF. Managed by Romspen Investment Corporation - a company with disciplined lending principles honed through decades of experience - the Fund provides financing for commercial real estate, 93% of which is secured by first mortgages. Since the Fund's inception, returns to investors are in the range of 10% per annum, payable on the 15th of every month.

Vision or mirage?

It was certainly unexpected, and perhaps unprecedented. At the end of his official business in Ramallah last Thursday with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, visiting U.S. president George W. Bush held a special, unplanned press conference at the fabled King David Hotel in Jerusalem.

His language was unusually blunt.

"The point of departure for permanent status negotiations to realize this vision [two democratic states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace and security] seems clear: There should be an end to the occupation that began in 1967. The agreement must establish Palestine as a homeland for the Palestinian people, just as Israel is a homeland for the Jewish people. These negotiations must ensure that Israel has secure, recognized, and defensible borders. And they must ensure that the state of Palestine is viable, contiguous, sovereign, and independent."

The president minced no words, enunciating beliefs that pleased and displeased both sides. (See the text of Bush's statement on the Perspectives page.)

He spoke with a harsh resolve that evinced his determination to help broker a peace agreement between the Israelis and the Palestinians. He is to be commended for his resolve, and, we believe, his sincerity, too, though we understand there are many more factors underlying American policy than concern alone for Israel's future.

"The establishment of the state of Palestine is long overdue," the president said. "The Palestinian people deserve it."

Not too many people in Israel would disagree with the president's propositions. But they would quickly add that the establishment of the state of Palestine has been thwarted by Palestinian leaders who, countless times over the past eight decades, have betrayed their own people by constantly striving to destroy the Jewish state rather than build a Palestinian one.

The president has urged immediate negotiations between Israeli and Palestinian leaders. He is even optimistic that "the peace agreement should happen, and can happen, by the end of this year."

But the president's optimism hardly seems justified.

Setting aside the difficult, religiously charged issue of Jerusalem, the president is ignoring the proverbial gigantic elephant in the room: Hamas.

Of course, he said what needed to be said regarding terrorism: "Security is fundamental. No agreement and no Palestinian state will be born of terror. I reaffirm America's steadfast commitment to Israel's security."

But what does that mean in an actual, practical sense? Hamas is sworn to the elimination of a Jewish state. Abbas has not, likely cannot and apparently will not remove Hamas from the Palestinian picture. The vision of "two democratic states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace and security" is doomed to be nothing more than a delusional mirage on a bloody horizon as long as Hamas – and all that it represents – remains entrenched as part of the Palestinian society and cultural ethos.

When I attended Associated Hebrew School, it was discovered that I had a learning disability. The staff at Associated and my parents felt that the only solution would be for me to enrol at She'arim Hebrew Day School ("She'arim parents fear school will close if funding ends," CJN, Dec. 20). I completed grades 6 and 7 in 1988 and 1989 at She'arim. I was retrained how to learn using cutting-edge strategies that are not used at mainstream schools.

It is often difficult for teachers to identify students who might require a "different" type of instruction in a large class. The She'arim staff was amazing at catering to my personal needs and helping me grow. They helped me to strengthen my ability to learn and to retain information being communicated to me. I returned to the mainstream school system and was very successful in keeping up with the rest of the students. I then attended the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and graduated with the rest of my classmates.

I have a bachelor of arts degree in psychology from York University and a diploma in human resource management from the Seneca College Business School, and I am now a sales manager at IBM Canada. I have always felt that if it were not for those two years at She'arim, I might not have been able to reach my current level of success.

I would hope that if my one-year-old daughter grows up with similar challenges that she would have the same opportunities available to her as I had. I urge the Toronto community and Mercar (formerly the Board of Jewish Education) to take action to ensure She'arim receives the funding it requires. Our children's future education and future careers might depend on it.

Before I was enrolled at She'arim Hebrew Day School, I was having academic difficulty ("She'arim parents fear school will close if funding ends," CJN, Dec. 20). Taking me out of my classroom for remedial tutoring didn't accomplish much other than demoralize me and single me out from my peers. My parents hired tutors for me, but that didn't help, either. My parents asked administrators at the school I was attending for advice, and they were told that I should stay in the school, struggling, and hopefully be able to pull off a pass. At She'arim, however, they saw that I had potential, and in only a little while, I began to see the same thing.

At She'arim, my classmates and I received the individual attention we needed. The teachers at She'arim introduced me to new ways to study and new ways to think. After two years at She'arim, I was accepted in a challenging high school. In my final year, I achieved an average of above 90 per cent in my program, which included three math courses and two science courses – the very subjects that I was failing before attending She'arim. At my high school graduation, I received an award for the highest grades in sciences.

I was offered scholarships at several universities. I chose to study sciences at York University, but after one year, I was accepted into the chiropody program at the Michener Institute for Applied Health Sciences. I have received two old photographs taken in Burzenin, Poland. One picture shows three girls in a garden, one of whom has a Star of David on her dress. Her last name was Galbart. The photograph was reportedly taken during the early stages of the German Nazi occupation of Poland. Ms. Galbart lived on Burzenin's main street, Koscielna. The other picture, an aerial view of Burzenin, includes the Galbarts' house, a white-walled building on the right side of the street. A Jewish family by the name of Majloch lived next door to the Galbarts.

Ms. Galbart survived the war and later lived in Toronto. She would be about 80 years old now. If you have any information about her or any relatives who might want to have these photographs, please let me know.

Bush delivers blunt message to Israel

'Establishment of the state of Palestine is long overdue'

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

The thorny question of Israel's West Bank settlements dogged U.S. President Bush's overarching message during his eight-day tour of the Middle East: democracies must unite to confront terrorism.

In language that is unusually blunt, considering his warm relations with Israel, Bush made clear his frustration with Israel's failure so far to deal with outposts, or unauthorized new settlements.

"In terms of outposts, yeah, they ought to go," the Bush said, standing alongside Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert last Wednesday after a day of meetings.

"Look, I mean, we've been talking about it for four years. The agreement was, get rid of outposts, illegal outposts, and they ought to go."

In response, settlers said they would expand two existing outposts and pledged to add another. The president was able to view outposts last Thursday on his way to talks with the Palestinian Authority. One, near Beit El, was fronted by a sign – in place long before the Bush visit – that stated: "We have returned to our home established 3,800 years ago."

Bush needs progress in Israeli-Palestinian peace to nudge forward his twin visions of democratizing the Middle East and diminishing the influence of Iranian theocrats. His sole speech in the region was to be made in Abu Dhabi Sunday, when he was to press his case for greater liberties in the region – in the emirate that faces Iran across the Persian Gulf.

For years Israel, pro-Israel groups and neo-conservatives have been telling Bush that promoting stability in the broader Middle East was not necessarily contingent on Israeli-Palestinian peace.

If he ever believed that message, it's clear he is now retreating from it. With just a year left in his presidency, he is eager for a legacy better than the Iraq morass.

Israeli foreign ministry officials said they redelivered the message in meetings, telling Bush that nudging Arab states toward accommodating Israel was perhaps more achievable in the short term.

But Bush wants the outline of an agreement in hand before he leaves office.

Speaking last Thursday in Ramallah, standing alongside Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Bush was unequivocal: Palestinian independence was not as intractable a goal as some would have it.

"Now, look, there are some in the world who don't believe in the universality of freedom," he said. "I understand that. They say, like, 'Freedom is OK for some of us, but maybe not all of us.' I understand it, but I reject it. I believe in the universality of freedom."

"I believe, deep in the soul of every man, woman and child on the face of this earth is the desire to live in a free society. And I also believe free societies yield peace. And, therefore, this notion of two states living side by side in peace is based upon the universality of freedom, and if given a chance, the Palestinian people will work for freedom."

Later in the day he reiterated that view, summarizing his two days of meetings with Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

"The establishment of the state of Palestine is long overdue," the U.S. leader said at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem. "A peace agreement should happen and can happen by the end of this year."

Bush reiterated calls for the parties to adhere to the internationally sponsored "road map" peace process that he launched in 2003, calling on the Palestinians to stop terrorist attacks and create a secure environment for Israel. And he called on Israel to end settlement expansion and remove illegal outposts.

He said the parties must address all the core issues. On borders, he reiterated one of the principles of his 2004 letter to then-Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, saying "any peace agreement will require mutual adjustment to the 1949 line." This was widely seen at the time as an acknowledgment that Israel would retain some of the areas beyond the 1967 borders.

At the same time, he said a Palestinian state must be contiguous.

Bush also said the Palestinian refugee issue should be addressed by "new international mechanisms, including compensation."

Bush said the agreement "must establish Palestine as a homeland to the Palestinian people just as Israel is a homeland to the Jewish people."

Bush did not let the Palestinians off the hook during his visit. While in Ramallah with Abbas, the president said he understood why Israelis want to keep in place the roadblocks and checkpoints that frustrate Palestinian travel.

"I can understand why the Palestinians are frustrated driving through checkpoints," he said. "I can also understand that until confidence is gained on both sides, why the Israelis would want there to be a sense of security. In other words, they don't want a state on their border from which attacks would be launched. I can understand that. Any reasonable person can understand that."

Abbas, standing beside Bush beneath portraits of himself and his late predecessor, Yasser Arafat, beamed – and understood.

"We are fully satisfied with the outcome that we reached through this visit of Mr. President George Bush," he said. "All the issues are in agreement. We are agreed on all topics. All topics are clear."

Bush also urged Israel to clear the way for a Palestinian security force.

"By any obvious measure, the Palestinian security forces are improving," he said at the news conference in the "Muqata," the PA headquarters that were levelled by Israel during the second Palestinian intifadah from 2000 to 2004 and rebuilt in part with U.S. assistance.

"My message to the Israelis is that they ought to help, not hinder, the modernization of a Palestinian security force," he said.

Israel has prevented PA security forces from receiving some equipment. It wants assurances that the forces is fully professional, noting the involvement in the past of some PA troops in attacks on Israel.

Bush's message on the outposts was a jarring moment in an Israel trip that has otherwise been a love fest between Bush and Olmert. The Israeli prime minister appeared so taken aback that he rushed to say – in Hebrew – how much he trusted Bush and how he would act soon on the settlement issue.

"Thank God I can conduct political negotiations with George Bush at my side as one of my partners," Olmert said, elevating the U.S. status from arbiter to peace partner. "Thank God we can conduct political negotiations when the largest and most important power in the world, and the most important for us, is headed by such an important friend of Israel."

'Occupation must end,' president says

Statement by U.S. President George W. Bush on the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, at the King David Hotel, Jerusalem, Jan. 10.

Good afternoon. I'd like to, first, thank [Israeli] Prime Minister [Ehud] Olmert and [Palestinian Authority] President [Mahmoud Abbas] Abbas for their hospitality during my trip here to the Holy Land. We had very good meetings, and now is the time to make difficult choices.

I underscored to both Prime Minister Olmert and President Abbas that progress needs to be made on four parallel tracks.

First, both sides need to fulfil their commitments under the road map. Second, the Palestinians need to build their economy and their political and security institutions. And to do that, they need the help of Israel, the region and the international community. Third, I reiterate my appreciation for the Arab League peace initiative, and I call upon the Arab countries to reach out to Israel, a step that is long overdue.

In addition to these three tracks, both sides are getting down to the business of negotiating. I called upon both leaders to make sure their teams negotiate seriously, starting right now. I strongly supported the decision of the two leaders to continue their regular summit meetings, because they are the ones who can, and must, and – I am convinced – will lead.

I share with these two leaders the vision of two democratic states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace and security. Both of these leaders believe that the outcome is in the interest of their peoples and are determined to arrive at a negotiated solution to achieve it.

The point of departure for permanent status negotiations to realize this vision seems clear: there should be an end to the occupation that began in 1967. The agreement must establish Palestine as a homeland for the Palestinian people, just as Israel is a homeland for the Jewish people. These negotiations must ensure that Israel has secure, recognized, and defensible borders. And they must ensure that the state of Palestine is viable, contiguous, sovereign, and independent.

It is vital that each side understands that satisfying the other's fundamental objectives is key to a successful agreement. Security for Israel and viability for the Palestinian state are in the mutual interests of both parties.

Achieving an agreement will require painful political concessions by both sides. While territory is an issue for both parties to decide, I believe that any peace agreement between them will require mutually agreed adjustments to the armistice lines of 1949 to reflect current realities and to ensure that the Palestinian state is viable and contiguous. I believe we need to look to the establishment of a Palestinian state and new international mechanisms, including compensation, to resolve the refugee issue.

I reaffirm to each leader that implementation of any agreement is subject to implementation of the [internationally sponsored] "road map" [peace plan]. Neither party should undertake any activity that contravenes road map obligations or prejudices the final status negotiations.

On the Israeli side, that includes ending settlement expansion and removing unauthorized outposts. On the Palestinian side, that includes confronting terrorists and dismantling terrorist infrastructure.

I know Jerusalem is a tough issue. Both sides have deeply felt political and religious concerns. I fully understand that finding a solution to this issue will be one of the most difficult challenges on the road to peace, but that is the road we have chosen to walk.

Security is fundamental. No agreement and no Palestinian state will be born of terror. I reaffirm America's steadfast commitment to Israel's security.

The establishment of the state of Palestine is long overdue. The Palestinian people deserve it. And it will enhance the stability of the region, and it will contribute to the security of the people of Israel. The peace agreement should happen, and can happen, by the end of this year. I know each leader shares that important goal, and I am committed to doing all I can to achieve it.

Proud to be a fox

Are you a hedgehog or a fox?

The late political philosopher Isaiah Berlin divided thinkers into two categories: "hedgehogs" and "foxes." A hedgehog knows one dramatic way to engage its enemies: rolling into a ball and pointing its barbs outward. Similarly, "hedgehog" thinkers have one central idea around which they structure all their thought.

"Fox" thinkers, on the other hand, present multiple ideas in a less-than-unified fashion, like a fox, who employs multiple strategies to hunt prey.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, in Montreal

The hedgehog and the fox are excellent metaphors for thinkers — there are thinkers with one big, central idea, and big thinkers with lots of small ideas.

To me, the "hedgehog" and the "fox" are also excellent metaphors for personal accomplishment.

There are hedgehog accomplishments and fox accomplishments. Usually, we notice the hedgehogs a lot more. The Bible features hedgehogs such as Abraham and Moses who transform the world through faith and leadership. Chronicles focus on the hedgehogs of history, heroic statesmen such as George Washington and David Ben-Gurion.

However, most people won't be hedgehogs. For the rest of us, there is still the possibility of heroism, albeit of a different sort: the heroism of "foxes."

A fox is content to know he doesn't have to transform history by himself. Rabbi Tarphon's statement in Pirkei Avot that it's "not incumbent upon you to finish the task" is his creed. The fox humbly accepts he can't solve the world's problems by himself.

At the same time, the "fox" is very busy. Rabbi Tarphon also reminds us that "neither are you free to absolve yourself from the task." The fox isn't a quitter. He simply manages his expectations. In fact, because the fox doesn't desire an immediate triumph, he doesn't despair in the face of overwhelming odds. Instead of grand gestures, the fox works slowly at changing the world, one good deed at a time.

The Torah is made for the heroism of foxes. With a scheme of 613 duties, the Torah is telling us that foxes make a difference. One small act of goodness may seem insignificant, but an army of foxes doing hundreds of small mitzvot can perform truly heroic acts.

All of us have been transformed by the deeds of foxes. I can recall my seventh grade teacher complimenting me on a good question, which encouraged me to pursue new intellectual vistas. I can recall how my grandfather's joyful nature taught me to always interact with others in a cheerful way.

It's usually the foxes — the people who cook dinner or teach Talmud — that transform our lives.

Foxes can't change the world overnight. But they don't quit, either. By changing one life at a time, foxes also accomplish the truly heroic, without fanfare and grandeur.

That's why I'm proud to be a fox.

Lessons from a flawed process

Don't worry, the Bouchard-Taylor commission recently assured critics. A statistical analysis of the 22 reasonable-accommodation forums proves that only two per cent of the comments made by "citizens of French-Canadian origin" were racist or xenophobic.

Another 13 per cent of the citizens said something "negative" about minorities, but consider the good news: 85 per cent were "moderate or pluralistic" or "respectful, even when they were off topic," Gérard Bouchard told the Montreal Gazette.

Alas, the tragicomedy of this commission and the entire "reasonable accommodation" debate cannot be quantified or so easily dismissed. Did applause meters gauge the ovations that some of the hostile comments received? Did the commission's statisticians compare the loud-mouths' coverage to the pluralists' coverage?

Just as a good attorney never asks a question to which he or she does not know the answer, such well-educated commissioners should have known that their lovely forum risked showcasing the haters among us. In today's media environment, the bad usually upstages the good. The hostile make headlines, the shrill get heard.

Moreover, the commission itself was created after a string of petty complaints about immigrants and ethnics daring to be different were exaggerated into a full-blown crisis by strident xenophobes feeding sensation-seeking reporters. The commission played into their hands, giving the narrow-minded a platform for broadcasting their views — and feeling validated by the applause they received. As a result, rather than teaching bigots to hide their prejudices in shame, xenophobes learned how to become local heroes and have their views taken seriously.

The commission's greatest failure stems from the silence we have heard in reacting to the bigots. Had Quebec Premier Jean Charest — or any other natural leader in society — denounced the bigots in a searing, dramatic fashion that the media could have showcased, the commission would have had more positively dramatic results. The uncomfortable silences and awkward, half-hearted defences amid the bigotry are part of the hearings' depressing narrative — and a fact of life that liberal-minded Quebecers must shamefacedly acknowledge.

In fairness, the commission raised an interesting democratic dilemma, worthy of the kind of brilliant analyses Charles Taylor has produced in his academic work. In a democracy, free speech allows all kinds of views to be expressed. Those of us with faith in the free marketplace of ideas trust the good ideas to drive out the bad ones. Moreover, the only thing worse than a travelling show that unwittingly showcased some of Quebec's racists and haters would have been a sanitized, politically correct forum that lacked authenticity.

The commission hearings — and this entire issue — have provided a wakeup call to those who long preferred to ignore Quebec's provincialism. Even the phrase "reasonable accommodation" sends a message to immigrants, ethnics and others that they're not welcome. It unrea-

Campus anti-Zionists don't need protection

Those of you not immersed in the politics of academia may not have heard about the anti-Israel resolution put forth at the recent annual meeting of the Modern Language Association. The MLA, a scholarly organization, represents researchers and professors of literature and languages.

With more than 30,000 members, the influential organization provides a forum for the exchange of research, as well as addressing other matters of concern to the profession. It plays a vital role in the process of hiring literature professors and helps shape policy regarding tenure, standards and working conditions. Through its conferences and publications, it exerts influence on what and how millions of students learn. Most literature professors consider MLA membership de rigueur. I joined as a graduate student and over the years have held office in the organization.

At the most recent MLA conference, which convened in Chicago just before the new year, the delegates' assembly — the governing body of the organization, elected by its members — considered a resolution tabled by the MLA's Radical Caucus that averred that critics of Israel were subject to prejudicial treatment on university campuses and in need of special protection.

The resolution contended that professors who openly criticize Israel put their careers at risk and were "fraudulently" labelled anti-Semitic. Untenured professors might find themselves denied tenure because of their politics, and more established professors might find their invitations to speak rescinded once their anti-Israel views are made public.

According to the resolution, such persecution of critics of Israel poses "serious danger to academic study and discussion." To remedy this, the resolution called on the MLA to "defend the academic freedom and the freedom of speech of faculty and invited speakers to criticize Zionism and Israel."

What is noteworthy about the resolution — in addition to its demand that a scholarly organization devoted to the study of literature and languages take on the politics of the Middle East — is its singular focus. Freedom of speech must be defended — but only the freedom to criticize Israel, not the freedom to promote or defend it, to advocate for Zionism, or even to entertain open debate. The resolution made no mention of the myriad other contentious issues on campus.

The resolution's supporters defended its unilateral language. They contended that critics of Israel are subject to intense pressure, from both inside and outside the university campus. The "silencing" of Israel's critics, they assert, has resulted in a neo-McCarthyism, an atmosphere in which anti-Zionists fear to air their views.

Excuse me? What universe of universities would they be talking about? Last time I was on a campus — and I am on campus almost every day of the year — critics of Israel had no problem finding a voice, a podium, a group of supporters. I speak not only of my own university, York, but of other Toronto campuses, as well as universities sonably pits the supposedly accepting majority against the unacceptable or tolerated minorities.

Both Quebec and Canada have too many faces, too many different groups, to see this dynamic as healthy. The Québécois themselves may be a majority in parts of Quebec, but they are a minority throughout Canada. Would those who treat tax-paying immigrants and ethnics as outsiders be willing to put up with a similar kind of condescension and questioning on a national level?

For many in Quebec's Jewish community, a year's worth of insulting controversies and prejudiced proclamations has been sadly instructive. True, the hostility expressed against Muslims shows that the issue is more about provincial xenophobia and fear of the "other" than it is about traditional anti-Semitism. But that offers little solace, especially as Jewish community leaders are forced to beg for continued school funding, as well as to justify the now-demonized kashrut label on grocery products and abjectly claim that the new, heavy-handed "Ethics and Religious Culture" course being imposed on Jewish day schools is somehow acceptable.

It seems that Jewish leaders so fear the anger expressed by the "two per cent" and "13 per cent" that they forgot the value of justified, righteous indignation. It also seems that too many of our non-Jewish and non-Muslim friends forgot the value of eloquently, passionately and boldly standing up for enduring Canadian and western ideals of democracy, diversity and true acceptance. And it seems the time has come to remind our neighbours and ourselves that love and liberty are fragile flowers that we all need to tend vigorously, and at times aggressively.

across Canada and the United States, where I frequently visit and lecture, and also keep abreast of through conversations with colleagues.

Anti-Zionism is in no short supply.

The resolution's defenders want to have it all ways: the right to speak and write their mind (academic freedom), but not to accord others the right to debate them. They demand the right to accept speaking engagements from those who agree with them, but not the right of those who disagree with them to refuse to invite them. They wish to stir others into political activism, but deplore activists whose politics disagrees with theirs.

At the extreme, they wish to write, speak and teach what they choose, even if it fails all academic (and sensible) standards, and yet not be called to account. In a companion resolution, the Radical Caucus asked that the MLA support Ward Churchill, a former professor of ethnic studies at the University of Colorado who was dismissed for "research misconduct" that included plagiarism and falsification of information. Churchill found his way to notoriety, you may recall, in a 2001 essay that referred to the victims of 9/11 as "little Eichmanns."

To the MLA's credit, the delegate's assembly refused to pass the Radical Caucus's resolution. Instead, it passed an amended resolution that acknowledged the contentious nature of Middle East politics and affirmed the right of professors "to speak forthrightly on all sides of the issue."

How fortunate for us. And how fortunate for the MLA, which skirted sliding into irrelevance in not allowing itself to be corralled in the way that the British professors' unions have been.

Engel beats back a devastating illness

That hot summer morning in 2001 could not have been more catastrophic for Howard Engel. When he picked up the daily newspaper from his front porch in the Annex neighbourhood in Toronto and scanned the stories on the front page, he was unable to read them.

The letters looked like Cyrillic one moment and Korean the next. Engel had suffered a stroke and succumbed to a rare condition, alexia sine agraphia. He could write but no longer read.

For a man who was addicted to the printed word, who described himself as a "reading junkie" and who earned a living as a professional writer, this was an unmitigated disaster.

But Engel, whose rich imagination spawned the Benny Cooperman detective novels, fought back and won.

Thanks to his dogged spirit, the skill and dedication of rehabilitation therapists and the moral support of friends, Engel more or less beat alexia and managed to reclaim his old life as a voracious reader.

Engel, too, resumed his career as a writer, using his experiences with alexia as grist for his mill. Memory Book, the latest instalment in the Benny Cooperman series, appeared two years ago and turns on Cooperman's recovery from a serious head wound. The Man Who Forgot How to Read (HarperCollins) was published this past summer.

Despite these signposts of progress, Engel, 77, has not exactly picked up where he left off six and a half years ago.

"I can read, but not with great speed," he said in an interview in his cluttered kitchen. "Some words trip me up, but I'm still hard-wired to reading."

Yet Engel, who now reads in a slow and ponderous fashion, has learned to live without newspapers and magazines.

"It would take me a day to get through a newspaper or a magazine. I get my news from the radio and friends."

Further, since Engel can't keep up with the fast-moving subtitles in foreign movies, he confines himself to English-language films these days. And because his memory was affected by his bout with alexia, Engel has resigned himself to living with a disability.

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

Yet he continues to buy and read books, which he considers his vice, and he has never stopped writing. In short, as he put it, he is getting on with his life.

Oliver Sacks, the famed neurologist who contributed an afterword to The Man Who Forgot How to Read, praises Engel's pluck in the face of adversity: "It is a struggle that calls for heroic determination and courage, as well as great resourcefulness, patience and, not least, humour, simply to survive, let alone to continue to write creatively, as Howard Engel has done."

Even during his darkest days in hospital, when the light at the end of the tunnel seemed dim, Engel continued to write. As he observed in his book, "I kept up my diary almost from the first. The fact that I couldn't read hadn't stopped me from writing."

To Engel, however, a book seemed beyond his abilities as he lay convalescing. "But without my knowing it, another part of my brain was beginning to plot out a story. Images began popping into my head."

And so Engel embarked on Memory Book, the 14th Benny Cooperman novel. But it was a rough slog. Words would fail him and ideas would vanish into a black hole. And whereas he could once whip off Cooperman mysteries in about two months, Engel needed six months each to finish Memory Book and The Man Who Forgot How to Read.

Engel wrote the latter to be a memoir, but his editor deleted the biographical details and focused on his illness. "For a while, I wondered whether we were going in the right direction, but I think it was a good decision," said Engel, who plans to use the discarded material in a future memoir about himself and his family.

Several months ago, Engel submitted his latest Benny Cooperman novel for publication. Titled East of Suez, it unfolds in a mythical country in the Malayan peninsula.

An indefatigable worker, he is now finishing his next Benny Cooperman novel after East of Suez, Taffy Was a Thief, which is set in the fictitious town of Grantham, Ont., in the Niagara region. "I thought it was time to get him back to his home turf," he said.

Engel, the founder of the Crime Writers of Canada, was a CBC-TV producer when he wrote his first Benny Cooperman novel, The Suicide Murders, in 1979.

He and his second wife, Janet Hamilton, had just had dinner when he retired to his room, leaving her and a guest to chat. Engel sat down in front of his manual typewriter and started typing. After an hour, he had composed seven pages. Within five weeks, he had produced a manuscript.

He had always enjoyed reading crime fiction, even as a child. His mother introduced him to the likes of Ellery Queen, Rex Stout, Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler.

"What came out was a voice with a personality, a guy with a high school education who lived in a small town," he explained as his tiny tortoise-shell kitten slithered across the kitchen table and meowed. "He was soft-boiled rather than hard-boiled. He was closer to Ellery Queen than to Sam Spade because he never got into a fist fight."

And, of course, Cooperman was one of the few Jewish detectives springing from the pages of a novel.

Until that burning creative moment, Engel had never harboured writerly ambitions. "I wanted to be an actor, a director or a puppeteer, but not an author. My earliest writing was for puppets in a show at school. I walked into the world of writing through a side door."

The "door" to which he refers was at CBC radio, where he produced such programs as Anthology, The Arts in Review and Sunday Supplement. For each segment, Engel would write "a little bit of script," and this exercise taught him the meaning of economy. "I learned that every word has to pay its own way."

Engel never imagined that The Suicide Murders would find a considerable readership. "I had no idea that anyone would buy it, and I was surprised that the publisher asked for more."

By the time he was let go from the CBC in the mid-1980s after a round of major staff cuts, Engel could support himself and his family quite well from the proceeds of the Benny Cooperman series. It has been published in dozens of languages, from Russian to Mandarin, and has proven to be lucrative. "My last car was a Volvo," he said.

Engel, nevertheless, has no inkling how many copies of his books have been sold worldwide. "I leave that to others," he said. "I don't read royalty statements. I just put the money into the bank."

One of his novels was optioned for a movie, but was never made. The Suicide Murders and Murder Sees The Light, his fourth novel, were turned into CBC television dramas in which the Canadian actor Saul Rubinek played Cooperman. Paul Soles portrayed Cooperman in two CBC radio adaptations of his other books.

As a character, Cooperman has undergone change since the appearance of The Suicide Murders in 1980. "He's older and better at his job," said Engel. "At the beginning, he was a divorce detective. But the laws in Canada have changed, and now Cooperman is involved in more interesting and challenging mysteries and gets a better class clientele."

As far as Engel is concerned, Cooperman will be around for many more years to come.

As he put it, "As long as I'm interested, I'll keep going."

By RACHAEL TURKIEVICZ

The holiday of Tu b'Shvat has taken on a new focus over the years. It began as the birthday of the trees and has become symbolic of various aspects of Judaism and environmentalism.

There is no question that Judaism, in its ethics and rendering of Jewish law, sits firmly on the recognition of environmentalism and our obligation to guard nature and repair the world. We have laws that dictate which fields to plant – and when and with what seeds – as well as laws that prohibit cruelty to animals and mixing species of vegetation.

Even in dire war circumstances, we are prohibited from levelling the trees around a besieged city, since we cannot declare war with the trees. Maimonides expanded that law to include a prohibition on the wanton destruction of anything. One states the obvious by saying that aspects of Judaism can only be fulfilled through environmentalism.

The midrash in Kohelet Rabbah states that God warns humanity to preserve nature. God instructs Adam and Eve: "See to it that you do not spoil and destroy My world, for if you do, there will be no one else to repair it!" We are the defensive guards of nature, and we are charged with restraining ourselves as we defend nature against its worst enemy: us.

It's interesting that in a modern world charged with environmental issues and causes and organizations, there is far more flag-waving than actual environmentalism, and yet in the ancient world, the reverse seemed to be the goal. One would think that in the rabbinic era, the Sages would have viewed preserving nature as being of the utmost importance, as everyone's lives were more directly connected with the flow of nature than in our technological world.

There is a beautiful text that discusses Abba Hilkiah and his wife. Abba Hilkiah is the grandson of Honi the Circle Maker. This is the family that has mastered the merit for achieving rainfall. The Talmud discusses a time of drought when the Sages seek out Abba Hilkiah and encounter baffling behaviour.

He is out in the field hoeing. They greet him, but he does not respond. When evening arrives, he puts his pile of wood on one shoulder and his cloak on the other rather than cushion his shoulder from the wood. He doesn't wear his shoes as he walks home, but puts them on as he walks through water. When he walks through thorns, he raises his cloak rather than protect his legs. All the way home, his behaviour baffles the sages.

When Abba Hilkiah enters his house, he tells his wife that he knows the sages have followed him to ask him to pray for rain. He suggests to his wife that the two of them slip away to the roof and pray for rain without the sages knowing – that way they will not have to thank them. They follow his plan, and his wife stands in one corner of the roof as he stands in the opposite corner. Shortly after his wife begins to pray, the rain starts.

The sages finally confront Abba Hilkiah and ask for explanations, and what follows is a beautiful list of things noticed by a Jewish environmentalist. Abba Hilkiah did not greet the Sages because he had been hired for his labour that day and didn't want to speak to anyone at the expense of his employer. He did not cushion his shoulder with the cloak because it was borrowed and he didn't want to risk damaging it. He didn't wear his shoes walking in the field because he could see where he was stepping and saw no need to damage his shoes. However, in the water he couldn't see and, therefore, put his shoes to use. He lifted his cloak walking through the thorns because if his skin got scratched, it would heal quickly, but the linen of his garment would permanently tear.

Again, his detailed explanations are striking for how they reveal his acute awareness of every action that he takes and its impact on those around him, as well as nature's impact on him and his belongings.

The sages finally ask why his wife's prayer was answered first. Abba Hilkiah answered, "My wife stays at home and gives bread to the poor, which benefits them immediately, while I can only give them money."

Jewish environmentalism is not just about obedience to Jewish laws that prohibits the obvious harms to nature. It's about the understanding that even the small choices we make in our daily lives can help us achieve what we pray for every day in the Aleinu: "letaken olam bemalchut Shadai," to repair the world that exists within the Sovereignty of God.

Archeological beginnings, Part II: excavating Ai

By ALEX GROPPER

The ruins of ancient Ai, the modern Et Tell, are an imposing heap of stones not far from the city of Ramallah. They are found just below the modern Arab village of Deir Dibwan.

I first became aware of their existence almost 40 years ago when I was one of a handful of students chosen to be part of a Canadian university contingent that was to excavate this important site. We were excited, since this was the first time Canadians would be involved in a major excavation since the legendary Kathleen Kenyon had stopped her work in Jerusalem after the Six Day War.

The site of Ai had first been excavated in the early 1930s by Judith Marquet-Krause, a brilliant, young Jewish-French archeologist who died tragically before she was able to finish her excavations. The site is crucial to the ongoing debate about the historical veracity of the Israelite conquest. The Bible ascribes its capture to Joshua and the Israelite army, but archeology seems to paint a different picture, indicating that the site of Ai had been in ruins since the end of the third millennium BCE.

Attempts have been made to reconcile the two versions, either by describing Joshua's conquest as an etiology, which means that the story of the existing ruin was ascribed to a more familiar figure such as Joshua, or by saying, as some scholars have done, that the conquest of nearby Bethel was transferred to Ai. Regardless, for me, that summer of 1968 was an amazing adventure.

Living among the Arab population of Deir Dibwan was an eye-opening experience. Once, my cousin Danny, who was an officer in the Israeli army, came looking for me. The Arabs, not knowing that he was my relative, assumed that I was in trouble with the authorities and tried to protect me by disavowing any knowledge of me or my whereabouts. I became an instant hero in the village as a fugitive from the Israelis.

For me, the excavations were more of a concern than my newfound heroic status among the Arabs. And indeed, we did find some amazing things. One of them was a large expanse of wall more than three metres high dating from the middle of the Early Bronze Age, around 2600 BCE. It was a phenomenal find from the dawn of civilization and showed that Canaan had been more than just a cultural backwater between the splendid and awe-inspiring civilizations of Mesopotamia and Egypt.

We found strong proof of Egyptian presence on the citadel, or acropolis, where the remains of the palace showed evidence of having been fashioned with an Egyptian saw at about the same time as the Pyramids were starting to be built.

Separated by about 3,000 years from the acropolis and located a short distance further down the wadi, leading from the top of the tell to the Jordan Valley, we came upon the remains of a Byzantine monastery. (The term Byzantine refers to the period in Israel after Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire in the fourth century CE, as well as to the eastern part of the Roman Empire, including Israel, that survived the fall of the Roman Empire in the West.) It was an exceptionally well-preserved complex that revealed much about monastic life from this period, which lasted until its destruction during the Arab conquest in 638 CE.

I got quite a shock when one of our workers pointed to a nearby Arab village and asked if I knew a friend of his from there. I was puzzled as to how I was expected to know a young Arab from a small village thousands of miles from my residence in Toronto until our worker told me the man's name and I was frozen with horror. This was the home of Sirhan Sirhan, the man who had assassinated Robert Kennedy just before I embarked on my voyage of discovery. The past had come forward into the present for me with chilling reality.

Past Forward

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This year, the State of Israel celebrates 60 years of independence. During the next few months, I will be presenting articles in honour of that milestone. The first one, appropriately enough, is about birthdays – from a Jewish point of view.

At first glance, it seems that the Torah does not have a lot to say about birthdays. In her essay Let Us Eat Cake, Lynn Harris points out that Encyclopedia Judaica is very blunt on this topic: "The celebration of birthdays is unknown in traditional Jewish ritual." In fact, the encyclopedia says that the only birthday party mentioned in the Bible is Pharaoh's! (Genesis 40:20). [tinyurl.com/2elf5g]

Rabbi Yanki Tauber says that Judaism traditionally observes the death of an individual, while the anniversary of a birth does not get as much attention. He explains that that's logical since a yahrzeit commemorates a lifetime of achievement. However, Rabbi Tauber then suggests that the birth of a child does merit celebrating in our tradition. "Birth marks the point at which your body received and fused with your soul, the point at which you attained your individuality." [tinyurl.com/rfgk6]

The Ohr Somayach site mentions several sages who marked their birthdays as auspicious days. "Rabbi Yisrael Lifshitz instructed his children that when one of them has a birthday, the others should visit and bless him. Similarly, distinguished members of Jerusalem's Jewish community used to visit Rabbi Shmuel Salant on his birthday and offer him their blessings."

[tinyurl.com/occhj]

The Talmud informs us that on our Jewish birthdays our mazal (good fortune) is dominant. Rabbi Naftali Silberberg explains that "your birthday is a day to express gratitude to God for bringing you into this world, entrusting you with the mission of illuminating it with the radiance of Torah and Mitzvot. This day, which is akin to a personal Rosh Hashanah, is the appropriate time to recommit to the mission at hand, resolving that the added maturity and experience gained during the past year will cause the following year to be even more productive and fruitful." [tinyurl.com/24csrq]

How can you help your child celebrate the day in a Jewish manner? In "Birthdays, Jewishly," Sandra Widener and Lisa Farber Miller have several suggestions: plan a Shabbat dinner dedicated to the person celebrating a birthday; have a tzedakah party at which kids are given extra money to put in a tzedakah box; or start a Saturday slumber party with a havdalah ceremony. [tinyurl.com/pw8or] in the coming year, you may want to check out related wisdom found in Pirkei Avot, the Teachings of our Fathers. Rabbi Yehudah ben Teima used to say:

If you are marking a special birthday

"Five years is the age for the study of Scripture.

- Ten, for the study of Mishnah.
- Thirteen, for the obligation to observe the mitzvot.
- Fifteen, for the study of Talmud.
- Eighteen, for marriage.
- Twenty, to pursue a livelihood.
- Thirty, for strength.
- Forty, for understanding.
- Fifty, for counsel.
- Sixty, for sagacity.
- Seventy, for elderliness.
- Eighty, for power."

(I'll leave it to you to check out what Rabbi Ben Teima had to say about turning 90 and 100.) [tinyurl.com/3d6djd]

While we're in the stratosphere of Jewish aging, one of the most famous blessings that Jews bestow on each other is, "Bis hundred und zwanzig – until 120!" The age of 120 is considered the ideal lifespan because Moses was 120 years old at the time that he died. (Deut. 34:7) [jewfaq.org/moshe.htm]

Happy Birthday to Israel and to everyone celebrating a birthday this year!

Shuls bring guests in from the cold

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

Staff Reporter

With temperatures dipping into the -20C range, many of Toronto's poor and homeless began 2008 with a desperate search for shelter.

And as it has for the last 21 years, the city's Out Of The Cold program - which provides shelter, food and companionship - offered sanctuary to some of the community's impoverished.

First begun in 1987 by some students at St. Michael's School who befriended a homeless man and helped him until his death, the idea quickly caught on with churches and synagogues around town as a permanent social action activity.

The proactive, multifaceted program, which runs from November to April, is co-ordinated out of Dixon Hall - a former downtown soup kitchen and now a charitable service agency - and continues to be a staple tikkun olam component for some Toronto-area shuls.

This season, along with numerous churches and schools, synagogues representing a broad spectrum of the Jewish faith will participate, including Holy Blossom Temple, Beth Shalom, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, First Narayever, Darchei Noam, Beit Rayim and Temple Har Zion. Many began housing, feeding and helping the needy through the program in late 2007.

According to the most recent statistics - the City of Toronto's 2003 Housing and Homelessness Report Card - close to 32,000 Torontonians made use of a shelter in 2002. Among those seeking refuge that year were more than 4,700 children.

This is why participating in programs like Out Of The Cold is a natural fit for shuls and their congregations: because in this instance, chesed is something that can literally warm those in need.

Participating congregations open their doors or offer aid one day of the week on a rotating basis, ensuring that at least one place of refuge is available every wintery night.

For example, Holy Blossom, 1950 Bathurst St., serves meals and entertains more than 100 guests and sleeps about 40 at its Out Of The Cold program every Thursday night via the efforts of more than 500 volunteers from the congregation and the community at large, according to its website.

The shul has participated in the program since 1996.

Program co-chairs Brooke Saks and Gary Pile help co-ordinate the effort at Holy Blossom.

"I love that we can put a smile on [guests'] faces. We have a really warm environment," Saks said. "We serve meals restaurant-style, so that our guests stay seated. I tell every volunteer that it's a 'guaranteed feel good' because [they] are making a difference in people's lives."

At Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, 100 Elder St., the shul opened its doors for this year's program on Monday, Jan. 14.

Beth Emeth serves dinners for up to 90 guests and has up to 30 people sleep over each Monday evening.

"I'm completely energized when I come to the program," said Shelley Cobrin, co-chair of the program at Beth Emeth for the past six years. "It's a safe environment, and you feel good about it [because] our guests are so appreciative. But the sad part is that it's just a drop in the bucket. These people need so much more."

Beth Shalom, 1445 Eglinton Ave. W., now in its ninth year with the Out Of The Cold program, provides accommodations for between 90 and 100 guests every Tuesday night until March 25.

Beth Shalom Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich says that this year, his shul has partnered with the Beth Tzedec, 1700 Bathurst St. in order to accommodate more guests.

"The program is a true and pure form of care and chesed. It provides the opportunity not only for some to get a meal and a bed in the winter, but for us to care for people in need," Rabbi Flanzraich told The CJN. "We've been told that spots at our place are 'coveted'... And we know [guests] understand that this program is an unequivocal expression of our faith."

For its part, Darchei Noam supplies around 60 volunteers to work in their Thursday night interfaith program, which runs out of St. Matthew's United Church, 729 St. Clair Ave. W.

Lynda Champagne, Darchei Noam's Out Of The Cold co-ordinator, said the shul has been involved in the program for the last 12 years.

"Our congregation really got behind the program. We offer friendship and companionship," she said. "I started out wanting to save... and fix homeless people's lives. But I've since learned that we're offering a band-aid solution. There are still many people who need to be housed who have mental problems or drug addictions."

Most synagogues rely on private donations and funds for their continued participation in Out Of The Cold, and are always on the lookout for benefactors to continue providing this service in their communities.

Arab anti-Semitism spoiling chances for peace

The Jan. 6 New York Times Sunday Book Review was titled "The Islam Issue." Notable writers and academics contributed 12 book reviews and several essays on the topic.

Writer Jeffrey Goldberg reviewed German scholar Matthias Kuntzel's Jihad and Jew-Hatred: Islamism, Nazism and the Roots of 9/11. If the book is as chilling as the review, it's a must read.

Goldberg began by recounting a recent visit to the gift shop of the Damascus Sheraton Hotel, looking for something to read. Among the slim pickings were several publications attacking Jews and Israel. For example, writes Goldberg,

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

a pamphlet called "Secrets of the Talmud" alleged that "[t]he Talmud apparently teaches Jews how best to demolish the world economy and gives Jews the right to take non-Jewish women as slaves and rape them."

Sadly, such hideous anti-Semitic conspiracy theories are popular not only in Arab states, but in the wider Muslim world as well.

Goldberg writes that Kuntzel's book is "bracing, even startling... [and] reminds us that it is perilous to ignore idiotic ideas if these idiotic ideas are broadly and fervently believed. And across the Muslim world, the very worst ideas about Jews — intricate, outlandish conspiracy theories about their malevolent and absolute power over world affairs — have become scandalously ubiquitous."

Goldberg explains that "[t]he notion of the Jew as malevolently omnipotent is not a traditional Muslim notion." The Qur'an shows the Jews defeated and conquered. And for centuries, Jews lived among Muslims in the Middle East. "[I]t is true that their experience was generally healthier than that of their brethren in Christendom, but only so long as they knew their place; they were ruled and taxed as second-class citizens and were often debased by statute." But "no one believed that Jews were in control."

Kuntzel's book argues that the current strain of anti-Semitism among Muslims was "imported from Europe" as "an actual project of the Nazi Party, meant to turn Muslims against Jews and Zionism." It involved such actors as Haj Amin al-Husseini, the mufti of Jerusalem, who lived in Berlin during World War II in the service of the Nazis.

Less well known is Hassan al-Banna, the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, who used German funds to distribute Arabic translations of Mein Kampf and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion across the Arab world.

The effects of this campaign are still being felt today. For instance, as an outgrowth of the Brotherhood, Hamas, in its Charter, refers directly (in article 32) to the Protocols as "proof" that "Zionists" are bent on controlling the world. In other articles, Hamas calls Jews "warmongers" who are responsible for "most of the revolutions" on the planet, including the Russian Revolution and even the French Revolution!

If Goldberg has any criticism of Kuntzel's book, it's that it understates the extent to which "organic Muslim ideas as well as Nazi ideas... led to the spread of anti-Semitism in the Middle East."

Today, media, mosques and schools in Egypt, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Iran — and even those under the control of the Palestinian Authority — promote these noxious ideas to one degree or another.

But, equally disturbing, they are also widely disseminated in more progressive Muslim countries such as Turkey, which has close military and strategic ties to Israel and is visited by many Israeli tourists.

The Middle East Research Institute (MEMRI) is highly respected for the accuracy of its translations of Arab and Muslim media. Its online "Antisemitism Documentation Project" (www.memri.org/antisemitism.html) includes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's rants against Zionists and the Holocaust, as well as tirades about Jews from Hezbollah and Hamas, and clerics and politicians throughout the Middle East.

At a time when much of the international media are focused on Israeli settlements as an "obstacle to peace," it's vital that attention be paid to the impact of widespread anti-Israel and anti-Jewish propaganda and indoctrination in the Middle East and beyond. Until and unless this stops, the genuine foundation for peace in the Middle East will remain a distant dream.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

THE BAND'S VISIT

The Israelis don't exactly roll out the red carpet for an Egyptian police band on its way to an initiation ceremony. But due to bureaucracy, bad luck, or for whatever reason, they were left stranded at the airport. This radiant and wise comedy about a benign miscommunication between the two countries is a real charmer.

"You have literally a handful of people who don't want to abide by BBI's court ruling. I don't know why this is a story. To exploit this story may cause harm to the Jewish community and BBC," he said.

Dimant said BBI's court specifically issued a gag order and the members subject to discipline appear to have violated it. Although the letters to the members state they are subject to expulsion, Dimant suggested the remedy might fall short of that, though he would not say what other sanctions are available.

Crestohl, a former BBC president, said the executive committee and the disciplinary committee cited in Wilner's letter were created under a proposed constitution that was defeated by members at the 2005 AGM. As a result, neither of those bodies have any validity, he said.

However, Dimant said BBI's appeal court disposed of that concern.

The court's one-paragraph judgement is cited in the executive committee's decision to expel its members. Part of the decision states: "The amended constitution of BBC was duly passed at a legally constituted meeting of the organization within its governing body's full jurisdiction. No irregularity in the procedures followed by BBC has been made out that would invoke the jurisdiction of this court."

In an e-mail response to CJN queries on the controversy within BBC, Dennis Glick, chair of BBI's executive regarding member issues, said, "This is an internal matter. Due process was followed, and the case is closed."

Crestohl maintains that "the court apparently decided it was more important to maintain the status quo than render a proper... decision," while Wolfe, who has practised law for 49 years, said he had never seen a court render a "judgement so sparse" on an issue so important.

The court, Wolfe continued, ignored evidence from those who attended the AGM that the constitution did not pass. It also did not address a motion asking that one member of the court recuse himself because of a perceived conflict of interest.

Ronson, a member of The CJN's editorial advisory board, said he was in the front row at the 2005 AGM when the new constitution was proposed "and defeated by a wide margin. Two-thirds voted against the proposed constitution."

"What is required is for the lay leadership to get back control of the organization," he said.

When he received the expulsion notice, Ronson said, "I just laughed. They're being ridiculous. I'm 93 years old. How much longer am I going to be a member?"

"I have a long history with BBC and the Jewish community. No one can damage my reputation. It's too established," he added.

Lindsay, a chartered accountant for 43 years, said he has been a vocal critic of constitutional procedures undertaken by BBC, particularly the officers' failure to provide audited financial statements at AGMs after 2001, contrary to Canadian corporate law and the organization's own by-laws.

He was also critical of procedures at the 2004 AGM, during which members were asked to approve audited financial statements without the statements being presented to the members. They were never approved.

"You want to talk about dysfunctional corporate governance," he said.

Gimpel said "there's a lot of talk among the lodges about what's going on."

Gimpel and Crestohl said they were prepared to fight the expulsions in the civil court system.

"I'm not going to take it lying down," Gimpel said. "I've already prepared to send letters to [BBC] donors I know of and explain exactly what is going on."

Disciplinary Committee Notice to Members

SENT BY REGISTERED MAIL

Dear Mr. Gimpel:

The Disciplinary Committee of B'nai Brith Canada has received a complaint regarding your conduct as part of a group calling itself the "Concerned Members of B'nai Brith Canada". A copy of the complaint is enclosed.

The complaint charges that your conduct is unbecoming a member of B'nai Brith Canada and contrary to the best interests of our organization. The remedy sought is an order of expulsion.

According to said section 26(e) of the Constitution, you have the right to a hearing before the Disciplinary Committee as the governing body considering this matter.

A Personal Message from Lou Myles

Dear Friends:

After 50 years of suiting YOU, the most wonderful people in the world, I am going to semi-retire. I am closing my retail store in Woodbridge and will be moving to new premises in downtown Toronto.

In preparation for this exciting move, I am clearing my Woodbridge store of all inventory. I have on hand a limited amount of ready-to-wear suits and sport jackets, as well as approximately 100 suiting and jacket lengths — fabrics ready to be custom made for you!

Thank you for all the fabulous years, and I look forward to seeing you very soon!

Sincerely,

Health scare on flight from Tel Aviv bungled: passengers

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Passengers on an Air Canada flight from Tel Aviv to Toronto are unhappy with the way airport, airline and medical authorities handled a potentially dangerous health scare.

On Jan. 9, eight passengers aboard Air Canada flight 085, who were participants of one of two birthright Israel groups on the same flight, became violently ill.

They were diagnosed with acute gastroenteritis, which is inflammation of the gastrointestinal tract. Their symptoms included nausea, vomiting and diarrhea. Health officials who met with the passengers told reporters that three passengers were hospitalized and assessed.

"There were about eight people who started throwing up on the plane," said Diana Zaidlin, a passenger on the flight who was on her way home from a birthright Israel tour, but not a member of the group that fell ill.

"It seemed like they had food poisoning or something," she said, adding that some were getting sick in their seats.

"People were vomiting, and people were sleeping on the floor of the plane, in the aisles," said Adam Saporta, 26, who was also on the flight and was a member of Zaidlin's group.

Natalie Links, 18, another passenger and member of the same group, said that she had two of the ill passengers sitting behind her, but she had no idea there was a problem until she disembarked the plane.

"We got through customs, but people weren't allowed to go get their baggage. Everyone was wondering why, and some thought it was because we didn't claim everything," Links said.

Air Canada representative Angela Mah told reporters that it's "standard operating procedure to have health officials meet the aircraft on arrival in cases like this."

But Zaidlin said that airport authorities made numerous mistakes in handling the health scare.

"From what one of the officers told us, they weren't supposed to let us off the plane. But they did. It was an accident. They caught us at customs, and some people had already gone to get their bags and they caught them and brought them back," she said.

Saporta, who was sitting at the front of the plane and was one of the first ones off, had to be tracked down by airport authorities after he had already retrieved his luggage.

"I was actually waiting outside the baggage claim for a friend of mine who I was supposed to take home with me and he never came out, so when I went back in, they pulled me to the side and took me upstairs. What was interesting is that there were six or seven people on our trip who just left. They didn't find them, and they [the passengers] didn't even know what was going on," Saporta said.

Scott Armstrong, the manager of media and communications for the Greater Toronto Airport Authority (GTAA), denied that it was a mistake that some of the passengers were able to leave the airport before being assessed by the medical team.

"Based on the information that was available to the medical staff, they made a decision on the floor," he said, adding that five agencies were involved in this incident: the GTAA, the airline, customs, the Public Health Agency of Canada and ambulance services.

The authorities managed to round up about 75 of the 201 passengers, who landed at 9 p.m., and held them in a corner of the customs area of the airport.

"It was very disorganized. I felt very confused. They didn't inform anybody," Saporta said.

"For half an hour we sat in the corner of the big customs room, where all the booths were. They put us off to the side and just left us there," Zaidlin said.

Links said that when passengers of other flights were coming through the customs area, they complained that they were in such close proximity to people who could be contagious.

"They said, 'Why are all these people here if they're all supposedly sick?' Then they moved us to another room," Links said.

"They put us in a stuffy, hot room and gave us water, but no food, and we stayed there for three hours, Zaidlin said."

"They didn't tell us anything, they completely kept us in the dark, and it honestly seemed like they had no idea what they were doing. They weren't organized, and we asked them and they said this wasn't the first time this had happened. But you figure that if this isn't the first time that they quarantined people, shouldn't they know what they are doing? They really didn't."

Natalie Links and Roman Levitin were quarantined at the airport after eight passengers on their flight from Tel Aviv to Toronto became violently ill.

Saporta said he was upset that about 75 people were forced to sit in a room with the ill without proper protection.

"We were all in the same room. In fact, I was sitting next to one of the girls who [had been] throwing up... She wasn't isolated from anyone else," he said.

"What if it was malaria or SARS or something? The whole plane would have gotten it. And not only that, everyone who left the airport and was not stuck in quarantine could have also infected the whole country."

Links said that it wasn't until one of the quarantined passengers announced that he had called the media that they were given masks and protective suits.

"Eventually, someone said that they called Citytv, so they were like, 'Well, now, we can't have a newspaper or a news company come and see that you guys aren't wearing suits,'" Link said.

In response to Saporta's complaint that he had been sitting next to a sick passenger in the isolation room for two hours before being given a mask and suit, Armstrong said, "It turns out that the protective gear wasn't required at all."

When asked if the gear should have been distributed right away, rather than two hours later, he said: "After any kind of an incident... we review the way that the procedure went... and we'll make adjustments based on what went well and what can be improved. But I'm not going to second guess every single decision that was made."

Zaidlin said that while she was being held by authorities, her waiting family was told that health officials were evaluating all the passengers.

"They told them they were taking all our temperatures and asking us all questions, which wasn't true. They weren't. They took a few people's temperatures, and they took those from the group who were sick and they took their temperatures."

Zaidlin, Links and Saporta said that their temperatures weren't taken before they were released, but they were asked if they had exhibited any of the symptoms on their way out of the holding room.

Saporta, who is in the process of writing a letter to Health Canada about his ordeal, feels that much improvement needs to be made in this area.

"There should have been someone on the plane right away giving masks and gowns... Something should have been done quicker. Thankfully, it wasn't anything major, but had it been something major, who knows?"

Mizrachi honoree is 'in front and behind the scenes'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Kurt Rothschild says he was very moved to learn that the World Mizrachi Organization is writing a Torah in his honour.

The Torah will be donated to a new community in the Halutzia region of the Negev, a cause near to Rothschild's heart.

The Toronto philanthropist and chair of the World Mizrachi organization, who spends about four months of the year in Israel, has been to the fledgling town many times. In 2005, he spearheaded a fund to help create new Jewish communities in the Negev for almost 10,000 evacuees from Gaza and the northern West Bank. He brought the idea to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which co-ordinated the fund, named for the former Netzarim settlement in Gaza.

In an interview last week at his decidedly non-upscale Toronto office, Rothschild said he was struck by the "courage" and "enterprise" of the former Netzarim residents who are building the town, and by "how much they've accomplished in such a short time."

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg, executive director of Mizrachi Canada, which is responsible for the Sefer Torah project in Toronto, said that a scribe in Israel has already begun the project and it's expected to be completed this summer.

Any additional funds raised will support educational institutions and social welfare programs in Israel and elsewhere, Rabbi Rosenberg said.

The Torah project is one aspect of Mizrachi's celebration of Israel's 60th anniversary this year.

Rothschild, a great-grandfather who believes the Jewish community's greatest need is the education of its young people, is being honoured for "his years of work on behalf of world Jewry," the rabbi said.

He is "in the front, and behind the scenes, in many areas in the community," Rabbi Rosenberg added.

Rothschild does not seek honour and "looks out for the benefit of each and every person within the wider Jewish community," he said.

"No matter how many projects he's currently involved in, the one he takes up at any given moment of the day is the one that has his full attention."

Rothschild's dedication to the Jewish community — he sold his national contracting business in 1987 to devote himself to it full-time — can be traced to his modern Orthodox upbringing in Cologne, Germany, and the effects of the Holocaust on his contemporaries and succeeding generations.

"I see in front of me the million Jewish children who were murdered and who would have been founding families and having children of their own and contributing to the future of the Jewish people," he said with quiet intensity.

After leaving Germany as a teenager, Rothschild completed his high school education in London, England, before going to work in an electrical shop there. He would later study electrical engineering at Queen's University.

In England, Rothschild was interned with several thousand other young German Jews and sent to Canada, where he spent two years in an internment camp near Fredericton.

Among the other internees was Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation and a fellow native of Cologne, whom Rothschild still counts among his friends.

Although he has always identified as modern Orthodox, Rothschild said he feels "very much part of the total Jewish community."

"I feel it is most important that we should stick together, even if we sometimes disagree on matters of ideology."

Rothschild puts his words into practice, "straddling" — as he puts it — the different parts of the Orthodox community, which in recent years has seen some marked divisions between its modern Orthodox and haredi sectors.

He attributes them in some cases to "excessive language."

In an attempt to moderate the situation, he sometimes tries to "talk to both sides," he said. "I think it's essential there should be an interrelationship of some kind, without sacrificing your beliefs."

As well, he said he has "no problem" going into communal halls of non-Orthodox synagogues and relating to people there.

However, he is careful to explain that he does not condemn others who feel differently, and also that for Orthodox Jews separation of men and women during prayer is mandated so they can focus on relating to God. "I do pray in Orthodox synagogues," he clarified.

"People may not agree with what I say, but they do know that I talk with integrity and not trying to gain political points."

In addition to his involvement with Mizrachi, which dates back some 50 years, Rothschild has served on the boards of institutions including schools, yeshivot and hospitals both here and in Israel.

'Programs are harder to sell than bricks'

A decision on the future of the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School – which is having cash flow difficulties and is being jointly managed by the federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education – is expected later this month.

For those who wonder why large sums of money are going to federation projects such as the new Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan and rebuilding the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) at a time when there is financial need in the Jewish education system, Koschitzky noted that the federation's Tomorrow project (which includes Lebovic and the BJCC) is run "completely separately," and that its funding does not come from the annual UJA campaign.

Federation funding encompasses a number of "circles" – capital projects, endowments, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, and the annual campaign – Koschitzky said. "Many times, donors have participated in two of these circles, but many times they are only interested in one."

The Jewish community has "a number of donors who want to give money to capital projects, whether to an art museum or the opera house," he added. "What we're trying to do is be a switchboard to connect them to Jewish causes."

Speaking in general terms, Koschitzky said that "programs, in general, are a harder sell than capital projects... It's an easier sell to sell bricks and mortar."

He said that transparency is "very important to today's federation," and that the average donor is told where his or her money is going.

According to information available from the federation online at jewishtoronto.com, the organization's campaign expenses total just under 10 per cent of funds raised and are "among the lowest of any non-profit organization."

Federation spokesperson Howard English told The C/N that marketing expenses – including a $20,000 campaign video that used, in part, professional actors – accounted for .004 per cent of the federation's $157 million in revenue last year from all sources.

Kits help give abused women a new start

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Elisha Wagman is determined to help abused women get a new start.

For five years, Wagman, 37, co-founder of Compound, a youth-based marketing agency, has headed a project aimed at collecting household items for women moving out of women's shelters.

The seeds for the project were planted in 2002, she said, when she learned that North York Women's Shelter had an emergency situation.

"The manager of fundraising had suddenly left, and there was a number of women moving out. The staff had nothing to give them that would help ease their transition.

"They were in a bind, and I conceived the project to help them through the process."

Wagman, who has worked in fundraising for a number of non-profits, such as the Law Society of Ontario, said that colleagues at Compound, as well as thousands of volunteers, went to work collecting household items such as cutlery, shower curtains, towels, pots and pan dust bins, and brooms. The items – T-Fal donated a number of small appliances and Sleep Country donated some beds and had them delivered – were packed in laundry hampers or plastic storage bins.

"These were items the mothers could not afford. They're not luxury items – they are necessities. Some mothers had four children, so the small amount of money the government provides as a start-up fee does not go very far," Wagman said.

"I began to wonder that if it's like this here, isn't it like this at every shelter? I did some research and discovered that all shelters have a gap in services."

In December, she said, they spent two days packing the collected items, and the Ontario Provincial Police delivered them to the some 30 shelters in the city, and helped them load and unload the kits.

Elisha Wagman, co-founder of Compound

Her ultimate goal for the project, Wagman said, is to teach staff at shelters to put together the kits themselves.

"Shelters are underfunded, and all their money goes towards programs and looking after the women," she said. "It's difficult, therefore, for them to assume the project, so we may have to do it until we get some trained volunteers."

She's always looking for volunteers to help out, she said,

"especially families. It's important for children to help shop for the items and help pack, because they learn an important lesson. We take so many things for granted. These women need items that we use without even thinking about it."

Wagman said she has received a number of "rewarding and heartbreaking" letters from women thanking her "for making sure they're not forgotten."

CIC 'disappointed' by Red Cross report on Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Canada-Israel Committee is strongly criticizing the Geneva-based International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) for a report it released late last year condemning

Moshe Ronen

Israel's treatment of the Palestinians. The CIC said it's dismayed by what it describes as a one-sided document titled Dignity Denied: In The Occupied Palestinian Territories, which paints Israel as a brutal regime and calls for political action against the Jewish state, despite the human-itarian organization's officially apolitical mandate.

Chapters are headed by subject titles that castigate Israel. Page 1 reads "Occupied," page 2 "Trapped in the Gaza Strip," and page 7 "Harassment by Settlers," while the closing

The latter section begins with an accusatory statement levelled at Israel.

"The dignity of the Palestinians is being trampled underfoot day after day, both in the West Bank and Gaza," it states.

The section closes by asking for "prompt, innovative and courageous political action [to] change the harsh reality of this longstanding occupation."

An earlier paragraph laments that "Gazans are often killed, wounded or arrested" when they approach fences surrounding their territory that were erected to prevent incursions by "militants" into Israel.

In response to the report, Moshe Ronen, national chair of the CIC, sent a letter to David Pratt, the Canadian Red Cross' adviser to the ICRC's secretary general and special ambassador to the humanitarian organization, in which Ronen reminded Pratt of remarks he made in Ottawa last November to the visiting families of captured Israeli soldiers about the Red Cross' inability to politically advocate for their return.

"Based on your statement to the [Eldad] Reggev and [Ehud] Goldwasser families that due to the ICRC official policy of neutrality in conflicts, the organization could not involve itself in any political action towards the release of the soldiers, I was surprised and disappointed at the [ICRC report]," Ronen wrote.

On its website, the ICRC's mission statement says that it's "an impartial, neutral and independent organization whose exclusively humanitarian mission is to protect the lives and dignity of victims of war and internal violence and to provide them with assistance."

In his letter, Ronen further calls the ICRC document "troubling" and a "monumental departure" from the Red Cross' traditional impartiality.

"Its condemnatory call to political action against Israel flies in the face of the principles you elucidated [to the soldiers' families] in Ottawa," Ronen wrote.

"[They] and the Canadian Jewish community will no doubt be left wondering why the ICRC refuses to intervene politically on their behalf when it so readily condemns the State of Israel."

Ronen ends by urging the Red Cross to "do everything in its power to safeguard the rights of the kidnapped soldiers, and all Israelis, without reference to a political agenda."

As of The C/JN's deadline, the CIC said it had not received a reply from Pratt, but the Canadian Red Cross said he was in the process of crafting a response.

Dorothea Krimitsas, the ICRC's media relations officer for the Middle East and North Africa, told The C/JN via e-mail last week that the report doesn't violate the organization's political neutrality.

"On Dec. 13, ICRC appealed for immediate political steps to be taken to improve the humanitarian situation in Gaza and the West Bank, because it came to the conclusion that humanitarian assistance alone cannot contain the deep humanitarian crisis there," she wrote.

"Calling for political action because humanitarian assistance is no longer enough to help solve the deep humanitarian crisis in the occupied territories does not mean that we are departing from our neutrality."

The ICRC published the Dec. 13 call to action in a statement on its website in which Béatrice Mégevand Roggo, the ICRC's head of operations for the Middle East and North Africa, said her organization "calls on Israel to respect its obligations under international humanitarian law to ease restrictions on movement in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank and to lift the retaliatory measures that are paralyzing life in Gaza."

Mégevand

Roggo did not call on Hamas or the Palestinian Authority to crack down on attackers targeting Israel. Instead, she asked that the "Palestinian factions" stop endangering civilians.

A link to the Dignity Denied report followed Mégevand Roggo's statement.

Asked whether the ICRC felt its document was missing context as to why Israel needs to maintain its security measures, Krimitsas replied, "The ICRC, as a neutral humanitarian organization, never comments on the reasons and causes for conflict, and, therefore, would not comment on the reasons why Israel takes security measures to protect its civilians."

She added that the Red Cross has "acknowledged on several occasions, including publicly, Israel's right to protect its own civilian population [and that]... access to captured Israeli soldiers remains a priority for the ICRC."

In a statement last summer, ICRC president Jakob Kellenberger said his organization was doing everything it could to determine the condition of Israel's kidnapped soldiers.

"In Lebanon and in Gaza, we have repeatedly called on those holding the soldiers to treat them humanely and with full respect of international humanitarian law," he said at the time. "We spare no effort towards achieving this goal. We do not take 'no' for an answer and do not give up."

The Red Cross still has no news or updates on the status of the missing soldiers.

Religious Pluralism in Israel:
An Issue For All Jews

Monday, February 4th at 7:30 PM
Beth Torah Congregation 47 Glenbrook Avenue
(Dufferin and Glencairn area)

Religious pluralism is usually regarded as solely an issue for Reform and Conservative Jews because of their lack of equal rights in Israel. Professor Cromer argues that it should not be of concern only to these groups. In fact, in an open society, a more pluralistic approach is ultimately advantageous to all Jews.

Gerald Cromer is Professor of Criminology at Bar-Ilan University where he has published in the areas of political extremism, political violence and terrorism. Professor Cromer is a founding member of Kehillat Yedidya, a modern orthodox congregation that has a long history of a more active role for women in the ritual and organizational aspects of the community and is involved in other nascent liberal Orthodox groups in Israel. He is a member of the Board of Directors of the New Israel Fund and involved in the Fund's work in the area of pluralism.

The Jan. 10 story "Foreign Affairs minister visits Middle East" erroneously identified Moshe Ronen as the CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). Ronen is the national chair of the CIC. Quotes attributed to Ronen in the story should have been attributed to Shimon Fogel, the organization's CEO. The story also inadvertently identified Ehud Barak as the prime minister of Israel. In fact, he is defence minister. Ehud Olmert is prime minister. The C/JN regrets the errors.

Torontonians help reclaim cemetery in Belarus

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A town that was once home to little more than 3,000 Jews in prewar Russia now has its shtetl's cemetery back.

Thanks to the efforts of Toronto couple Celia Siegerman Denov and Robert Bell, the Jewish descendants of families from Sharashova, Belarus, now have a physical reminder of what was once the town's Jewish minority.

Siegerman Denov, a retired social worker, told The CJN her father and his family immigrated to Canada from Sharashova in 1905.

The restoration of the cemetery was officially completed in September 2007 at a ceremony that was attended by Sharashovans, local politicians and dignitaries.

Siegerman Denov first became interested in restoring the cemetery after a cousin, who was working in Moscow in 1990, visited Sharashova in the early days of glasnost — when Russia opened up for renewed tourism — and discovered there were still some Jews living in the town.

At the time, she said, "the cemetery had been completely abandoned and was in very poor condition. In fact, it was so overgrown the [headstones] had fallen into the ground."

But it was still not as desecrated as other Jewish cemeteries of the region had been, she said.

Siegerman Denov visited her ancestral home for the first time in 2000, while on a trip with her cousins.

"When I first got to the cemetery area, I couldn't find

Celia Siegerman Denov contemplates the new monument she helped erect at the Sharashova cemetery

it. I was actually standing on it, but cows were grazing on it," she said.

On a return visit in 2005, Siegerman Denov had the good fortune to befriend Franklin Swartz, an American Jew living in Minsk, Belarus, who also happened to be the executive director of Voluntas: The East European Jewish Heritage Project — a charity that negotiates with the Belarus government to allow Jewish cemeteries to be listed as protected historic sites.

According to Siegerman Denov, Swartz quickly became an essential guide and interpreter and helped to obtain permits for the eventual restoration.

She also acknowledged the help and guidance of Michael Lozman, head of the charitable Eastern European Jewish Cemeteries Project Inc. in Albany, N.Y. (www.restorejcem.org), who also travelled to Sharashova with her.

The project, funded by the United Jewish Federation of Northeastern New York, collects contributions from the community to help "restore cemeteries... destroyed by the Nazis."

However, the cost of restoring the cemetery proved prohibitive until recently, when the Siegerman family was able to put nearly $20,000 together to privately finance the construction of a new metal gate and perimeter fence — about 1,500 metres long — and the erection of a cenotaph commemorating the Jews buried there and those lost to the atrocities of the Holocaust.

Its inscription reads: "In loving memory of the once vibrant Jewish community, with fervent hopes for a peaceful and just world for all. In memory of those who were deported to Auschwitz January 30 - February 2, 1943."

Though Bell and Siegerman Denov had to run all their wording and construction plans by a municipal "ideology monitor," they managed to get the work done by enlisting the help of the local townspeople.

Bell noted that Sharashova is still a small village in which many buildings are still without modern plumbing and people continue to use outhouses as the norm.

As such, the townsfolk relied on horse-drawn carriages to transport segments of the new fence to and fro and used scythes to clear the cemetery grounds of weeds.

"The local authorities advised us against using wood for the fence," Siegerman Denov said. "Because it could be taken down and used for fuel."

While on the trip, Lozman arranged for Siegerman Denov and Bell to meet with local high school students to talk about the Jewish community of Sharashova and ask them to write essays about what they knew of the Jews and the Holocaust.

"The elders in the village remember what happened to the Jews," Siegerman Denov said. "One boy wrote that his grandparents remembered the Jews. But the Jewish community was a bit of a mystery to them."

Still, when the cemetery was finally re-opened in early September, Siegerman Denov said she witnessed many of the town elders paying their respects and crying in front of the newly erected monument.

"Locals spoke and thanked us for doing this," Bell said. "Everyone in the village seemed happy we were there. Not just for giving them work, but for doing the right thing after all these years."

Bell noted that there wasn't time to raise all the headstones, and Siegerman Denov said she plans to return to Sharashova in the future to complete the work and add a Hebrew inscription to the cemetery's monument.

She called the endeavour "one of the most fulfilling and moving things I have done in my life."

Siegerman Denov and Bell also urged others wishing to restore cemeteries in eastern Europe to contact Lozman and Swartz, and to do so soon.

"There are so many abandoned Jewish cemeteries in eastern Europe. The time is right now, as governments are open to protecting [them] and urban development is imminent."

Doctors, family battle over issue of life support

By RHONDA SPIVAK

Special to the C/JN

WINNIPEG — The condition of an 84-year-old Orthodox Jew who is on life support is improving after doctors at Winnipeg's Grace Hospital tried to pull the plug on him more than a month ago, against his family's religious beliefs.

Minam Geller said her father, Sam Golubchuk, "is alert" and "his eyes are open."

According to Neil Kravetsky, the family's lawyer, it's only because the family went to court on Nov. 30 and obtained an ex parte injunction (without notice to the hospital) that doctors were prevented from removing Golubchuk's life support.

Kravetsky said that on Dec. 12, one day after a court hearing in the case, a notation in Golubchuk's hospital chart recorded some improvement in his neurological condition, including "some eye movement [in response] to voice," "more spontaneous eye opening" and "more spontaneous right arm movement."

On Dec. 17, the word "awake" was written in Golubchuk's hospital chart.

Kravetsky said that at the Dec. 11 hearing, Golubchuk's "entire chart was not presented by the hospital, only some parts of it." He asked for and received the chart from the hospital after the hearing.

Kravetsky sent the chart to Dr. Daniel Rosenblatt, a critical care physician in New Jersey, and Dr. Leon Zacharowicz, a pediatric neurologist in New York. Affidavits from both doctors were filed in court on Jan. 8.

Rabbi Avraham Altein

The affidavits won't be made public until Judge Perry Schulman rules on whether they are admissible as evidence.

Lawyers for the hospital and doctors have objected to the admissibility of the affidavits, saying it's not for the court to decide whether to prefer the opinion of one doctor over the other.

At a Jan. 11 hearing on the matter, a lawyer for Grace Hospital, Bill Olson, said that the "issue is whether the court through an injunction should be interfering in the process of dying, but you don't have to prolong it... A person is considered a goses if they cannot possibly live for 72 hours, even by using whatever machines modern medicine has available," he said.

"This means that if Golubchuk were a goses and he wasn't on life support, we would not be required to put him on it. However, even when a person is a goses, if he is already on life support, then it cannot be withdrawn... In Golubchuk's case, it can't be said he is a goses."

Arthur Shafer, director of University of Manitoba's Centre for Professional and Applied Ethics, said there should be no moral difference between putting someone on life support and then taking them off as opposed to never putting them on in the first place.

"Otherwise, doctors will be a lot slower to plug people in, and some people may die who should have been plugged in."

Shafer said that if Golubchuk "is in an irreversible vegetative state, he could potentially be like this for a very long time... If so, would the Orthodox Jewish community want to see tens or hundreds of thousands of people in Canadian hospitals kept alive for decades by ventilators and other machines? Is that how they want us to spend our scarce medical resources?"

He added that former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, "who appears to be in an irreversible vegetative state, may be getting this kind of treatment, but if every Israeli got this kind of treatment, the whole state budget would be used up. Should every Jew really be kept alive like Ariel Sharon?"

doctors' medical decisions."

The hospital maintains that it's the right of the physicians treating Golubchuk to decide when to terminate life support, as opposed to his family or the courts.

At the Jan. 11 hearing, Kravetsky told Schulman that the affidavits of doctors Rosenblatt and Zacharowicz were highly relevant and referred to facts recorded in the hospital chart about Golubchuk's condition that had not been put before the court by the doctors or the hospital.

"This court should have [Golubchuk's] full hospital chart. We are talking about a man's life," Kravetsky said.

"The evidence is so important [that] justice requires that it be admitted," he added.

Olson said that even if the judge decides that the treating doctors have the right to make the decision to pull the plug, this may not happen, as the doctors would re-evaluate Golubchuk's condition to see if the action is still warranted.

Schulman was set to render a decision on the admissibility of the affidavits of Rosenblatt and Zacharowicz, or give some direction about them, by the end of this week.

"From a halachic standpoint, what is at issue is at what point a person is considered to be a goses [a person in the final stage of dying]," said Rabbi Avraham Altein, Winnipeg's senior Chabad Lubavitch rabbi.

"When a person is a goses, you are not allowed to hasten

U.S. judge rules that forced sale of Stern art was theft

BY JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Rhode Island federal court judge has made U.S. legal history in ruling that the forced sale of art by Jews in Nazi Germany is the equivalent of theft.

The decision is a posthumous victory for Max Stern of Montreal, owner of the landmark Dominion Gallery for over 40 years, and a major turning point in an international quest headed by Concordia University on behalf of his estate for the restitution of the hundreds of artworks the German-Jewish Stern sold under duress after the Nazis came to power.

On Dec. 27, U.S. District Court Judge Mary Lisi ordered an elderly German-born aristocrat living in Providence, R.I., to hand over to the Stern estate a painting she inherited. Her stepfather bought the work over 70 years ago at a Cologne auction, where Stern, then owner of a Dusseldorf gallery, was forced to liquidate his remaining inventory and private collection.

Clarence Epstein, who is heading the Stern art restitution project, said the judgment "sends a strong message to all possessors of property looted" from Stern.

From 1935 on, Stern was under pressure to get out of the art trade because of the Nuremberg laws and was directed by Nazi officials, namely the Reich Chamber for the Fine Arts, to sell off his holdings. He is believed to have had to dispose of some 400 works between 1935 and 1937. The final sale was at the Lempertz auction house in Cologne in November 1937. The painting in question was one of more than 200 works that went under the gavel at that sale.

Lisi determined that the Stern estate is the rightful owner of Girl From the Sabiner Mountains, a 19th-century oil by Franz Xaver Winterhalter, that it was "taken unlawfully" from Stern and that the defendant, Maria-Louise Bissonnette, an 83-year-old baroness, is in wrongful possession of the painting. Concordia, along with McGill University and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem are the main beneficiaries of the Stern estate.

Lisi concluded that although the painting was paid for by her stepfather, Karl Wilharm, "It is clear that Dr. Stern's relinquishment of his property was anything but voluntary," Wilharm, she says, never had title to the painting and therefore neither does Bissonnette who inherited it from her mother in 1991, although she has had it in her possession since 1959. She has lived in the United States since 1956.

Sister encouraged by Bernier's comment on imprisoned brother

BY DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The sister of imprisoned Montrealer Saul Itzhayek was encouraged last Sunday by the report that Foreign Minister Maxime Bernier has asked Indian officials to have her brother's case "put in order as soon as possible."

But Sylvia Itzhayek also told The CJA that the family won't be satisfied until it sees some concrete action by the Indian government to free her brother, imprisoned for the last eight months and serving a three-year sentence in a remote Indian prison for crossing the border from Nepal with a lapsed visa.

Last Saturday, Foreign Affairs Canada issued a press release stating that Bernier had "discussed" the case with India's external affairs minister, Pranab Mukherjee, and industry and commerce minister, Kamal Nath.

Sylvia Itzhayek said she was initially discouraged by the vagueness of the statement, which did not elaborate on what "discussed" meant, but she was later buoyed by a subsequent report saying Bernier had conveyed the Canadian government's desire to see the case resolved expeditiously.

"It is an important case for us and we bring it up all the time," Bernier was quoted as telling reporters in Ramallah last weekend while on a visit to Israel and the West Bank.

The same report quoted Canadian parliamentary secretary Deepak Obhrai, who accompanied Bernier on the trip, as saying he was "hopeful that progress was being made" in the case.

Sylvia Itzhayek said she would like to see some sort of "timeline" that would give the family a clear sign that her brother would soon be headed home.

She said she spoke to her brother over the holidays, and he was very "depressed" over the lack of progress in the case. "He told me his 'heart hurt,' and I tried to encourage him as much as possible.

"We're pursuing all legal avenues in India, but he is very down."

She said Foreign Affairs has not been in regular touch with the family, except for about a month ago when her brother became ill from prison water. He is also reported to have lost 70 pounds.

Itzhayek, 42, was convicted and sentenced to three years in remote Motihari Prison on charges that former justice minister Irwin Cotler described as "trumped up" (Itzhayek lives in Cotler's Mount Royal riding).

Itzhayek was in Nepal on business when his driver crossed the border to collect funds being wired to Itzhayek. However, at the border, the car was stopped and Itzhayek's travelling documents seized. Itzhayek says he was arrested — despite Indian authorities' promises of safe passage — when he crossed the border to retrieve his documents.

Cotler has been a leading advocate for Itzhayek, as have others such as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Helena Guergis, Secretary of State Jason Kenney, Liberal MP Dan McTeague, and others.

According to a Canadian Press story last week, Canadian government officials who are "close to the file" said Ottawa was "sensitive" about being perceived as interfering in another country's legal process, "but believe there are several provisions in India's legal code that allow for Itzhayek's release."

"It's in [India's] self-interest to [release Itzhayek]. It does not serve the purpose for anyone for him to remain in prison. He poses no threat. Never did," Cotler told CP.

Sylvia Itzhayek, for her part, understands the principle that Canada should not "get involved" in another country's judicial process.

But Foreign Affairs' official policy, she said, is also that it "must" intervene on behalf of a Canadian national who is "denied justice" or discriminated against.

Kehilla program celebrates 25th anniversary

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Living in the Avenel, an apartment building near Avenue Road and Wilson Avenue sponsored by the Kehilla Residential Programme, has changed the life of Allen and his three children.

The 51-year-old single father of three teenagers who moved into the building about five years ago, said that after being diagnosed with cancer and then having a stroke, he was barely staying afloat.

"I did babysitting and some carpentry work, but when I had the stroke, I couldn't even go to the hospital because I had no one to care for the children."

Things began to turn around for him, he said, when he joined Temple Sinai. "They welcomed us with open arms. The kids started religious school and had b'nai mitzvot, and we've remained members. We've even had members put up my kids when I've been in the hospital."

When they joined the temple, he said, he was sleeping on a couch in a crowded apartment far from the Jewish community.

"It got to the point where I couldn't travel to synagogue," he said.

"We were fortunate, though, that with the help of JF&CS [now Jewish Family & Child], we got into this building. Now, we live on the bus line, and the synagogue is next door."

"As well, in this building, people look out for each other. It is a community within a community. I'm now living with dignity in the Jewish community, and I can work on other life issues."

Kehilla, which recently celebrated its 25th anniversary, is the official non-profit housing agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. It promotes affordable housing initiatives in the Jewish community, and its mandates include education and awareness, project sponsorship, development consultation, research and property management.

Its properties include the Avenel, which has 111 units, divided among singles, couples, families, and offers suites for physically challenged tenants; Project Marc, a mutually assisted residential community on Bathurst Street in North York; Habayit Shelanu seniors residences on Kendal Avenue near Casa Loma; 2 Neptune Drive, which offers life lease housing for independent seniors; and the Elm Ridge Group Living Residence for seniors, which is run in partnership with Jewish Family & Child and operated by Baycrest.

Promotes affordable housing initiatives in Jewish community

Emerging projects include a Kehilla community residential building being planned to be part of the new Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Community Campus in York Region that will include a Reena community residence, and an affordable rent subsidy program in collaboration with UJA Federation and private landlords.

Lisa Lipowitz, Kehilla's director of community initiatives, was on the development team for the Avenel when it was built in 1992. She said that a lot of original tenants still live there.

"When the building was built, we could pick Jewish clients, but with the demise of the [provincial] social housing program, we are not allowed to do that. We do have a lot of Jewish tenants, but the only thing that is Jewish about us is that we are in Jewish neighbourhoods."

She said that Kehilla started 25 years ago as a sub-committee of UJA Federation in order to look at housing for seniors. "It is now an affiliated agency of federation, and we are still facing the same issues. Lists are huge, and there is no movement. It is very frustrating."

Nancy Singer, Kehilla's executive director, said the agency is always looking for housing possibilities for the Jewish community.

"When federation purchased the property [in York Region for what is now the Lebovic Campus], we invited them to listen to us about our needs. Five years later, we've achieved some government funding, and we're about to build in collaboration with other Jewish agencies. [Our plans] are coming to fruition. It is a very exciting initiative."

She said that poverty levels in the Jewish community are only slightly below that of the general population.

Kehilla statistics note, among other things, that nearly one in seven elderly Jews in the GTA currently live below the poverty line; almost half of elderly Jewish women who live alone are poor; more than 4,000 Jewish working poor adults live below the poverty line in Toronto; and more than 4,000 Jews living in York Region live below the poverty line.

Singer said Kehilla has a history to be proud of. "Our name is not out there, but people do call us, and we give them leads."

Oren Levy, a Kehilla volunteer, said he works for the organization because he knows he is "helping Jewish families live with dignity."

JUMPing into life in Israel

Earlier this month, 47 students and young professionals from the Greater Toronto Area travelled to Israel on the inaugural trip organized by the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP). This subsidized, 10-day, post-birthright program combined all aspects of the Holy Land – Zionism, religion, history, culture, tikkun olam and spirituality.

Alison Firestone, top left, got emotional during the group's visit to the Western Wall. The madrichah, Debbie Osiel, top right, gave a big hug to Notti, a heart patient who will get free life-saving surgery from an Israeli organization called Save a Child's Heart. A beautiful view of the Bahai Gardens in Haifa can be seen on the bottom left, and next to it is a photo of Linoy Hazan, who enjoyed the view of the Arab quarter in Jerusalem from a lookout point. Lauren Breslin picked sweet, ripe tangerines straight from the trees at Kibbutz Shiller near Rechovot for an organization called Table to Table that provides food for needy Israelis. At left, Lindsay Malet, inspired by her visit to the Kotel, sits to sketch her view of the Wall. And fittingly, at the centre of it all, is a breathtaking view of Jerusalem.

Abe Zipursky מרים

Abe Zipursky passed away peacefully on December 7, 2007 with his family by his side.

Abe was born on September 12, 1920 in Winnipeg. He is survived by his beloved wife Belle Butovsky Zipursky of 65 years and by his children Sheldon (Judy), Gerry (Nancy), Debby (Ken), and Arnie (Fern) and grandchildren Mande (Jason), Josh, Sam, Simona, Michael, Max, Sharla, Bonnie, Dayna & Farah. Abe was predeceased by his parents Max and Fanny Zipursky and sister Eleanor Fayerman.

For 45 years, he worked and carried on with pride the tradition of the three generation kosher butcher shop business, Zipursky's Kosher Meat Market in Winnipeg. He also served the Jewish Community in a voluntary capacity as a member of the Hebrew Sick Benefit Association including the position as President of the men's social club.
Upon retirement in 1987, he and his wife Belle moved to Richmond, BC and then in 2005 moved to the Weinberg Residence in Vancouver. For Abe, known to his many friends as "Zip", his greatest joy was family and spending time with his children and grandchildren. The memory of his mild manner and wonderful sense of humor with his one-liners, will always bring a smile to the faces of his family and friends.

Coast to Coast

Ben Rose was 'a fine journalistic role model'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Journalist Ben Rose died earlier this month after what his children referred to as a long period of declining health. He was 86.

Obituary

His association with The C.J.N. as a reporter spanned more than 25 years, during which he concentrated on theatre, films and music, as well as general assignments.

C.J.N. editor Mordechai Ben-Dat said that Rose "was an invaluable, veteran writer on the staff of The C.J.N. His experience in the field dating back to World War II and his innate sense of what comprised the essence of a news story brought great credit to the paper. Ben was a friend and an adviser, and a fine journalistic role model to his younger colleagues."

Rose was born in Ottawa. His father was a pedlar who sold dry goods, chickens, eggs and apples to farms around the province. The family moved with him to Hull, Ont.; Bowmanville, Ont.; and later Toronto, where Rose attended Central High School of Commerce.

It was there that a supportive teacher inspired him to go into journalism, his daughter Ruth Hall said.

In Bowmanville, the family had a makeshift tennis court, where Rose learned to play. He continued to play tennis with great enthusiasm for many years.

In 1961, he won the Sloan Rockefeller Foundation Fellowship in Science, at Columbia University, and he, his wife Fanny and their two oldest children, Ruth and Henry, spent a year in New York.

He began his journalism career at the Ottawa Journal. While there, he twice won the Ottawa Press Club Award.

In 1944, he joined the Toronto Star, where he worked for 21 years, concentrating on science and medical stories.

Together with fellow journalist Dennis Braithwaite, he founded the Newspaper Guild, a union for reporters. "It didn't make him terribly popular with the editors and publishers," Hall said.

However, she added, "he believed in standing up for what was right, even if it wasn't the most popular opinion."

For several years, he was an information officer for the Toronto Board of Education. From 1969 to 1972, he served as a trustee in Ward 6.

After that, he taught journalism at Sheridan College in Oakville, becoming co-ordinator of the course.

C.J.N. news editor Jeff Rosen was a student of Rose's at Sheridan College. He described him as "demanding — he expected nothing but the best."

Later, when he came to work at The C.J.N., even though he had been a professor and Rosen a student, "he didn't put on airs," Rosen said.

"I learned a lot from him. He will be greatly missed."

Hall remembered that he not only enjoyed theatre but even directed some plays, one of which included her.

His wife, Fanny, she said, "played a big part in his life." Together, they loved to travel, explore and meet new people. When they got older, she said they went on several Elderhostel tours.

He was very close to his children and grandchildren, Hall said.

Rose was predeceased by his brother Maurice and sister Lilian. He is survived by his wife Fanny; his daughter Ruth Hall and her husband Terry; his son Henry and his wife Anne; and his son Paul and his wife Janice, as well as grandchildren Jeremy, Grant, Josh, Alicia, Nathaniel, Sarah, Houston and Adam.

Creating a Jewish family tree

The Ontario Jewish Archives, part of the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage and a department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is offering half-day workshops on how to create a Jewish family tree.

The workshops, given by Bill Gladstone, C.J.N. writer and avid genealogist, will provide an overview of many Jewish genealogical sites on the Internet.

Participants will learn how to use Family Tree Maker software, and by the end of the workshop, they will be able to locate family information on the Internet and create their own family trees. Funding for the Virtual Family Tree Workshops is made possible through the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Workshops will run from 1:30 p.m. to 4:30 p.m. on Jan. 20 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and on March 16 at the Lipa Green Building.

To register, contact the Ontario Jewish Archives at 416-635-2883, ext. 170. Fee is $50 per person or $75 per couple.

Individual solutions from independent advisors

Luscious lemon recipes

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I recently returned from a three-day "gal pal" trip to the Northern Galilee area of Israel with two friends. It was heavenly. We had perfect weather, a leisurely drive, a lot of laughter, panoramic views of the crashing Tanur waterfalls, gorgeous wildflowers everywhere we looked, a pristine bird sanctuary and the Tel Dan Reserve, which is like stepping into a wonderland with scores of bubbling brooks feeding into a running river, and tall treetsops that reach for the sky and make it refreshingly cool.

We lodged in a charming cabin complete with a Jacuzzi in a small picturesque village not far from the northern border of Israel.

Now, you might ask, is this a travelogue or a food column? The grounds and gardens of the place where we stayed were a paradise of trees and flowers—a grove of pecan trees that was so beautiful that Motti, the owner, said his son's wedding was held there.

In the afternoon, while we lounged in the garden, Motti was pruning his fruit trees and we became the recipients of his hard work. When we left Gan Yerok (Green Garden) our car was so laden with bags of clementines, pomelos and lemons there was hardly room for our luggage.

What do you do with almost 100 lemons? You go through all your recipes to find every lemon recipe you ever made and liked. I wish I could share these lovely lemons with you, but at least I can share the recipes.

LEMON AND GARLIC CHICKEN

I don't remember where I got this recipe from although it originated with someone's housekeeper who cooked for parties. It's a dish that you'll make time and time again.

The quantity of this recipe can easily be varied. It should be served with rice.

8 chicken thighs, skinless or not* salt and pepper to taste
olive oil

1 part fresh squeezed lemon juice
2 parts dry white wine

2 whole heads garlic, peeled or not

*Your choice: My favourite is thighs, but other parts may be substituted. If you use breasts, cut them in half so the pieces are not too big. I wouldn't use all breast. You need the flavour from the thighs.

Preheat oven to 325. Salt and pepper the chicken to taste. You want it pretty salty.

Heat oil in a pan and brown the chicken over medium to medium high heat. Add 1 cup lemon juice and 2 cups white wine. The sauce should pretty much cover the chicken. If it doesn't (depending upon the size of the chicken pieces), just make up a little more and add.

Add 20 or more garlic cloves. Sometimes I don't bother with all of that garlic peeling. Just cut the whole heads of garlic in half. You can pick out the husks later.

Put the uncovered pan into the preheated oven. Bake and turn the chicken about every 20 minutes. A bulb baster is great for this. This will take an hour or more. When the chicken is falling off the bone tender and the sauce has reduced a bit, it is ready.

Notes: For really large quantities, you can skip the browning and cook at a lower temperature for a longer time and some browning will happen. I think that is what she did for the big crowds. For variations, you can add herbs of choice, diced preserved lemon, capers, or olives. Makes 8 servings.

LEMON UPSIDE-DOWN CAKE

This is definitely not low caloric, but it's divine. Select small lemons for this cake; they're the ideal size. When the cake is done, it's inverted onto a serving plate and the top magically displays a lovely arrangement of caramelized lemon slices.

4 small lemons
1 cup plus 2 tbsp. butter (2 1/2 sticks), divided
1/4 cup packed light brown sugar
1 1/2 cups flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
2 tsp. vanilla extract or paste
1/4 cup sugar
2 eggs
1/2 cup milk, soy milk or water

Cut 3 of the lemons into 1/8-in. thick slices. Remove seeds and set aside. You will have about 30 lemon slices. Grate 1 teaspoon lemon peel from the remaining lemon. Set aside the grated peel; save the lemon for another use.

Heat 4 tbsp. of the butter in a 10-in. cast iron skillet or an ovenproof 10-in. saute pan until melted. Brush the sides of skillet with a little of the melted butter. Add the brown sugar, stir until it is moistened with the butter and spread it into an even layer. Arrange the lemon slices, slightly overlapping, to cover the bottom of the skillet. Set aside.

Heat the oven to 350. Combine the flour, baking powder and salt in a bowl and set aside.

Cut the remaining 6 tbsp. butter into a mixing bowl. Add vanilla extract or paste. Using an electric mixer, beat the butter, scraping down the sides of the bowl, until creamy. Add the sugar and grated lemon peel and beat until light and fluffy. Beat in the eggs one at a time.

Add half the flour mixture and beat until blended. Add milk or other liquid and beat until combined, then add the remaining flour mixture and beat until blended.

Spread the batter over the lemons in the skillet to cover evenly. Bake 30 to 35 minutes, or until the cake is golden and the centre tests done. Let the cake stand 5 minutes, then invert the skillet onto a platter. To serve, slice into wedges with a sharp knife. Makes 8 servings.

LEMON BISCOTTI WITH SOUR LEMON DRIZZLE

A real treat for lemon lovers and light in calories. If you make enough to freeze, store them in the freezer without the drizzle, then make and add it before serving.

2 1/4 cups all-purpose flour
1 cup sugar
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tbsp. grated lemon rind
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice, divided
1 tsp. lemon extract
1 tsp. vegetable oil
3 large eggs
cooking spray
1/2 cup powdered sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly spoon flour into dry measuring cups; level with a knife. Combine flour, sugar and baking powder in a large bowl. Combine rind, 1 tsp. lemon juice, extract, oil and eggs, and add to flour mixture, stirring until well-blended (dough will be dry and crumbly). Turn dough out onto a lightly floured surface; knead lightly 7 to 8 turns. Divide dough in half. Shape each portion into an 8-in.-long roll. Place rolls 6 inches apart on a baking sheet coated with cooking spray; flatten each roll to 1-in. thickness.

Bake at 350 for 30 minutes. Remove the rolls from baking sheet; cool for 10 minutes on a wire rack. Cut each roll diagonally into 15 (1/2-in.) slices. Place the slices, cut sides down, on baking sheet. Reduce oven temperature to 325; bake for 10 minutes. Turn cookies over; bake an additional 10 minutes (the cookies will be slightly soft in the centre but will harden as they cool). Remove from baking sheet, and cool completely on wire rack.

Combine 1 tbsp. lemon juice and powdered sugar, and drizzle over the biscotti. Makes about 36.

Chef seasons his cuisine with food history

By ROSIE SCHWARTZ
Special to The CJN

Eucalyptus is back. Famed chef Moshe Basson has finally reopened this long-time Jerusalem institution, much to the delight of locals and tourists alike. The return of his restaurant, where he serves biblical cuisine, is very welcome in this ancient city.

But while the restaurant may have been closed for a few years, Basson was still delighting food lovers all over the world. He has been a sought-after guest chef for fundraising cooking demonstrations in Jewish communities across the United States. He's cooked at Israeli embassies for events in all corners of the world, from South America to Asia.

He recently prepared meals at the Balsamico festival in Modena, Italy, as part of his Chefs for Peace program. There, together with fellow Palestinian chef Odeah Abu Elhawa, he cooked his biblical cuisine for a festive dinner in the spectacular Ducal Palace. He has won a Slow Food Couscous competition in Sicily, beating out rivals from a host of Middle Eastern countries. And his son, Ronny, who seems to be following in his father's footsteps, recently triumphed together with another Israeli chef at the latest world couscous championship 2007 in San Vito Lo Capo in Sicily.

The original Eucalyptus, opened in 1988, was built at the site where a Eucalyptus tree was planted by Basson one Tu b'Shvat in the Talpiot neighbourhood of Jerusalem. He then moved the eatery to a more central location on Horkanos Street in the Russian Compound. It was after a move to Safra Square – the location of the new City Hall – that the second intifadah began and, like so many other businesses, Eucalyptus had to close its doors. But now it's back on Horkanos Street. This is where I first met the man with an endless knowledge of Israel's natural bounty and its history – both recent and ancient.

For Basson, herbs and spices are not something to purchase, but instead, something to gather or forage. The country is like his personal garden. Mention a place in Israel and a local may tell you of a scenic or historic attraction. Basson will tell you what is indigenous to the area. He knows what grows wild and when it is available. At the same time, he knows the history of each plant and how it was used in the cuisine of thousands of years ago. While archeologists may have details about various sites around the country or historians about battles, Basson knows what was used in meals from biblical times and how things were prepared. But he also tells of the khubeiza, the wild green that sustained Jews during the siege of Jerusalem in 1948. And as fascinating as his explanations of his various preparations are, the stories are definitely matched by the mouth-watering tastes.

At a recent dinner at Eucalyptus, we feasted on Basson's specialties. His tasting menu, Shir Hashirim – or Song of Songs – began with a trio of soups. The tomato mint, Jerusalem artichoke and biblical lentil have all been on the menu as Eucalyptus staples. Picking a favourite was next to impossible.

Then came a delicious variety of mezze. Pickled green almonds, currently a hot ingredient for California chefs, marinated black olives, hummus and eggplant salad tasted like no other we had sampled before. It was tempting to finish it all off, but then we saw that we needed to pace ourselves. A plate that looked like mashed potatoes was anything but ordinary. Seven herbs including thyme, hyssop, mint, parsley and a sage-scented olive oil, made for a dish to savour.

Purslane, a wild green and wild spinach followed. A smoky eggplant dish with technah made us want to lick the plate. The offerings continued with a green smoked wheat salad – along with its history – stuffed grape and sage leaves, tamarind-sauced figs stuffed with chicken and then a pie filled with lamb and vegetables. The ma'aluba, a chicken and rice casserole flavoured with spices like cinnamon and allspice, comes out of the kitchen with great fanfare. By then, it wasn't just the vegetables and fruit that were stuffed. But we couldn't resist another of Basson's signature dishes – his Middle Eastern version of peanut butter and jam – date syrup and technah with fresh figs.

There's no doubt that Basson's cuisine is as unique as it is mouth watering. At the same time, he continues to delve into the origins of what he serves. His latest quest is to research whether couscous really originated at the time

Food, Scrumptious Food

An old country Shabbat

By ADAM MENCELES

Special to The CJN

In all areas of the Jewish religion, grandparents love to tell stories to their grandkids. Whether it's a tall tale or something they genuinely lived through, these stories stick with us until we tell them to our children and they, in turn, pass them on to theirs.

The following story has to do with food, but not just any food. I'm talking cholent. Cholent is an enigma. It's the basis of all comfort and it encompasses everything that is right in this world. Think of the history behind cholent as a rite of passage into the understanding of Judaism.

Cholent is, in its simplest form, beans baked with smoked meat, kishka and other personally or culturally preferred ingredients.

Back in Eastern Europe, Jews led a fairly modest existence when it came to food. Families tended to be large and there was a need to feed many hungry children.

When Shabbat came along, cooking was forbidden. You needed something nice and heavy that could fill your children's stomachs, which at the same time, would not empty your pockets. Even if you made something ahead of time, how would you go about cooking it?

Since some towns were fairly small and people knew each other quite well, there was a trust that was shared between villagers. These people needed a dish that would basically cook itself. They had to think of something that was cheap and could be made ahead of time.

Beans were the answer. How would you cook these beans? Slowly, in the local baker's bread oven overnight.

Everyone had a casserole pot that held the heat well. Before Shabbat, people would make the cholent and give it to the baker on Friday evening. By the time shul ended on Saturday afternoon, all they had to do was pass by the bakery on their way home and pick up their pot of cholent for lunch.

Then, after Shabbat was over, there was leftover chicken fat from the soup trimmings. What did people do with leftover chicken fat? They tried it to make an additional treat. Jews were cutting the fat off of the chickens and saving it for a rainy day. These chicken cracklings made a nice, although somewhat sinful, snack.

of the first Temple to be used in sacrificial rites, rather than from the Arabic world - definitely food for thought.

If you can't visit Eucalyptus in person, here are a few samplings you can try at home.

JERUSALEM ARTICHOKE SOUP

- 1 lb. Jerusalem artichokes, peeled
- 1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- 2 medium onions, chopped
- 2 cloves garlic, minced
- pinch saffron
- 6 cups homemade or sodium-reduced chicken or vegetable broth
- 12 blanched almonds
- 3 tbsp. water
- 3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
- salt and freshly ground pepper

Prepare Jerusalem artichokes by cutting larger ones into quarters and smaller ones into halves. Set aside. Heat oil in a large saucepan over medium heat; add onion and garlic and sauté until soft, about 10 minutes. Add Jerusalem artichokes and sauté another 4-5 minutes. Add saffron and broth and bring to a boil. Simmer covered for about 25-30 minutes. In the meantime, grind almonds finely in a spice grinder or food processor. Mix together with water in a small bowl. Add to soup with parsley. Season with salt and freshly ground pepper and serve hot. Makes 6 servings.

TAHINI AND DATE DIP

This dessert from Moshe Basson is as simple and tasty as you can get. Fresh fruit slices - bananas are super - or warm pita bread can be used for dipping. Vary the quantities according to the size of your plate and the number of people you are serving. This amount is perfect for a 6-inch plate. Date syrup is available at Middle Eastern or specialty food stores.

- 4 tbsp. techninah
- 2 tbsp. date syrup

Spread the techninah evenly over a plate. Drizzle the date syrup into a circle about an inch from the edge of the plate. Repeat twice more making smaller circles inside each other moving closer towards the centre. To complete the decorative effect, using a toothpick, make lines as if dividing the spread into quarters and then divide each quarter into halves. When you do this, the date mixture will blend slightly with the techninah. Makes 4 servings Military option against Iran 'still on the table'

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Neither Israel nor the United States has eliminated the military option against Iran, according to a senior Israeli official.

Briefing journalists Thursday on U.S. President George W. Bush's talks in Jerusalem, the official said that while both countries preferred diplomatic and economic measures, they did not "remove any option from the table."

"I don't want to speak for the president, but when we say all options are on the table, this is not just words," the Israeli official declared, underlining his country's seriousness.

The official said that Bush had acknowledged both in public and in private the danger posed by the Iranian nuclear weapons' program.

"Iran was a threat, Iran is a threat and Iran will be a threat if the international community does not come together and prevent that nation from the development of the know-how to build a nuclear weapon," Bush declared at a joint news conference last Wednesday with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Tehran is high on the agenda for Israel and the United States

While Bush's meetings with Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas have focused mostly on the Israeli-Palestinian issue, Iran is high on the agenda for Israel and the United States.

Bush began his mission to the Middle East in Jerusalem on Wednesday. After meetings with Israeli and Palestinian officials, he will be heading to the Persian Gulf states, Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

Asked whether Israel had shown the president any intelligence contradicting the U.S. National Intelligence Estimate that Iran had stopped its clandestine military nuclear program in 2003, the official said: "This is one of the areas our countries and establishments, including the intelligence establishment, are working in very close co-operation. We don't wait for any special event before passing on information. I assume that the president knows whatever we do."

Bush's upcoming visit to the Gulf region, Saudi Arabia and Egypt would be very significant, the official said, as it could help strengthen the moderate Arab coalition against Iran. He said pressure from the moderates "will hopefully turn into meaningful influence on Iran's calculations regarding its nuclear program."

The official confirmed that Israel and the United States had discussed the ongoing rocket attacks on southern Israel from Hamas-controlled Gaza, and said the Americans recognized Israel's need to take military action in response.

The United States "understands Israel has the right, and that sometimes it has no choice but to take action to defend itself," he said.

Substance and symbolism: parsing Bush's words

By RON KAMPEAS

JTA

Picking apart U.S. President George W. Bush's summarizing of his Palestinian-Israeli peace brokering is a little like reading the fine print in the nutritional information on comfort food: There is empty puffery, to be sure, but there are also nuggets of substance.

Bush, speaking last Thursday at Jerusalem's King David Hotel, was summing up two days of working meetings with the leaders of the Israeli and Palestinian governments, his first presidential visit to the region.

Much of what Bush put forward was not new or was symbolic, but there were a few ground-breaking items, including his clear-cut call yet to the Israelis to freeze settlement expansion and a call for compensation for Palestinians dispersed after the creation of Israel in 1948.

Commentary

Bush opened by reaffirming four old commitments. They are to the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan, the vision of Palestinian statehood and an end to his approval of the Arab League peace plan of the same year, to his call last year for institution building to bolster the government of Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president Bush believes to be the best chance for peace, and to the peace process that was relaunched this past November in Annapolis, Md., where Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert agreed to meet regularly to resolve impasses in talks.

If anything was different here, it was Bush's insistence on routine meetings. Abbas and Olmert have met just twice since the end of November, most recently last Tuesday, the day before Bush arrived.

"I called upon both leaders to make sure their teams negotiate seriously, starting right now," the president said. "I strongly supported the decision of the two leaders to continue their regular summit meetings because they are the ones who can, and must, and I am convinced, will lead."

Bush also reiterated his support for Israel as a Jewish state and called again on Arab states to begin the process of recognizing Israel.

"I call upon the Arab countries to reach out to Israel, a step that is long overdue," he said. "The agreement must establish Palestine as a homeland for the Palestinian people, just as Israel is a homeland for the Jewish people."

On the record, Israel and pro-Israel Jewish groups insist the points Bush made in his statements are critical to getting Arabs to understand that Israel is here to stay. But off the record, Israeli officials say that earlier Palestinian recognition of Israel already affirms their acknowledgment of its Jewish character.

The same officials say that burgeoning trade relations with the Arab world are a harbinger of full relations sooner rather than later.

Bush emphasized that terrorism must stop and expressed "America's steadfast commitment to Israel's security," a commitment Israelis already appreciate in the form of $3 billion in annual defence assistance.

Within the space of a couple of sentences, Bush appeared to contradict himself by invoking two years with very different meanings to both peoples: 1949 and 1967.

"The point of departure for permanent-status negotiations to realize this vision seems clear — there should be an end to the occupation that began in 1967," he said.

But then Bush added: "While territory is an issue for both parties to decide, I believe that any peace agreement between them will require mutually agreed adjustments to the armistice lines of 1949 to reflect current realities and to ensure that the Palestinian state is viable and contiguous."

How does one honour 1967 lines while adjusting 1949 lines when they are essentially the same thing?

This speaks to each people's most vulnerable sensibilities: Palestinians who now accept Israel's existence as it was established in 1948, grudgingly or not, are loath to extend such recognition to the territories it won in the 1967 Six Day War. For Israel, 1949 evokes a vulnerable, slimy state in perpetual existential anxiety.

An "end to the occupation that began in 1967" acknowledges the Palestinians' sense that relinquishing parts of the West Bank goes too far.

But it does not count out land swaps that recognize the reality of major settlements abutting the "Green Line," the pre-1967 borders of Israel, and that protect Olmert from the prospect of evacuating hundreds of thousands of settlers instead of the tens of thousands that he has suggested he is ready to undertake.

Here, in fact, Bush moved beyond his April 14, 2004, letter to then-Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the first time Bush effectively recognized the major settlements. In the 2004 letter, he said such recognition is "realistic"; here he says it is "required."

Still, it may be hard to reconcile the two visions. Within minutes of Bush's statement, his national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, was having trouble with it in a roomful of reporters.

"What that's actually going to look like — how much territory, is it all going to go back, is it less than all, how much? — all that's going to have to be negotiated," Hadley said. "But it is important to have some principles and concepts, and to get some narrowing of the parties' understanding and emerging agreement on those principles when you go into a negotiation to do the details."

Bush on Thursday also made his first foray into the toughest issue involved in any permanent-status negotiations: Jerusalem. But he did so without advancing any substantive proposals like those laid out by former U.S. president Bill Clinton in his own final year in office.

"I know Jerusalem is a tough issue," Bush said. "Both sides have deeply felt political and religious concerns. I fully understand that finding a solution to this issue will be one of the most difficult challenges on the road to peace, but that is the road we have chosen to walk."

The most substantive shift in Bush's statement dealt with the issue of settlements and refugees.

Bush's earlier road map called on Israel to freeze settlements, but almost as an afterthought at the end of the section describing the first phase; most of the section addressed Palestinian security requirements. The 2004 letter did not mention such a freeze. That reinforced Sharon's contention that the first phase was sequential: end terrorism, and then deal with settlements.

Bush's statement Thursday gave each aspect equal weight.

"Neither party should undertake any activity that contravenes road map obligations or prejudices the final-status negotiations," he said. "On the Israeli side, that includes ending settlement expansion and removing unauthorized outposts. On the Palestinian side, that includes confronting terrorists and dismantling terrorist infrastructure."

Bush also for the first time anticipated compensation for Palestinian refugees. The so-called right of return for Palestinians who fled or were chased from their homes upon Israel's creation has been another thorny issue that Israelis see as a non-starter and a threat to its existence.

"I believe we need to look to the establishment of a Palestinian state and new international mechanisms, including compensation, to resolve the refugee issue," he said.

In his 2004 letter, he spoke only of their return to a Palestinian state.

If the substance of the statement seemed weighted to the Palestinians, Bush could get away with it because of his record of friendship with the Israelis — a point Hadley had put forward in a pre-trip briefing when he said the president's pro-Israel record "built an enormous confidence in the Israeli government in the president."

Indeed, Bush stressed his commitment to Israel's security several times.

"Security is fundamental. No agreement and no Palestinian state will be born of terror," he said. "I reaffirm America's steadfast commitment to Israel's security."

Left unmentioned in the statement was the status of the Gaza Strip, currently controlled by Hamas, the terrorist group that continues to enable the shelling of southern Israel.

At other points in his tour, Bush said he sees a deal coming before statehood. That way, he reasons, a deal negotiated by Abbas — who rejects Hamas as a usurper — could be put to the Gazans.

Bush says he is "confident" the Gazans would accept a negotiated settlement, although that is far from certain. Loyalties to Hamas fluctuate in Gaza, and it is not clear that Hamas would allow a referendum or new elections to take place in any case.

Olmert acknowledged that commitment in a joint appearance with Bush last Wednesday, agreeing that the time to deal with the settlements issue was the present.

"Thank God we can conduct political negotiations when the largest and most important power in the world, and the most important for us, is headed by such an important friend of Israel," Olmert said. "We have no interest in delaying matters."

After Bush's summary statement on Thursday, Israeli officials welcomed it as "consistent with understandings between us and the administration."

For his part, Abbas was clearly pleased with the visit, saying in a joint appearance with Bush, "All the issues are in agreement. We are agreed on all topics. All topics are clear."

One outcome of Annapolis was that Bush persuaded both sides to make the United States the arbiter of an agreement. And with his visit last week, the president made clear he expects such an agreement within a year.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2008 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 29, 2008. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 2008.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 20, 2008. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Kenya crisis puts Jews on alert

BY JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — While the Jews of Kenya seem unscathed by the country's political crisis, Jewish nongovernmental agencies that work there and elsewhere in Africa are bracing for the long-term effects of the sudden outbreak of violence.

Interethnic violence erupted Dec. 27 after the incumbent president, Mwai Kibaki, declared himself the winner of the country's presidential election amid evidence of widespread fraud. Opposition leader Raila Odinga maintains he won the election.

An estimated 500 to 1,000 people have been killed and more than 250,000 left homeless as a result of rioting and pitched battles between members of minority tribes, including Odinga's Luo tribe, and members of the Kikuyu tribe, the elite clan that has controlled Kenyan politics since the country gained independence in 1963.

The unrest has shaken the nongovernmental organizations that work in eastern and central Africa. Rioting and roadblocks set up by vigilante groups have made travel impossible, and the violence has endangered workers.

Though the violence has eased somewhat this week, Jewish groups are on alert.

"People are afraid about the violence and are staying home and out of the street, and it is very difficult to reach people," said Julia Greenberg, the director of grants for the American Jewish World Service, which funds the relief work of 14 organizations in Kenya.

The AJWS works mostly with groups in the slums of Nairobi, including Kibera, and in western Kenya, where the fiercest violence has occurred.

It wasn't until Jan. 7 that the AJWS was able to regain contact with the groups it funds, according to Maitri Morarji, the program officer who oversees East Africa for the organization. The AJWS is assessing the needs of the groups it funds and may distribute small emergency grants to help feed people, Morarji said.

"Everyone is looking at security issues, and everyone is holding back new projects," Will Recant, the assistant executive vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, told JTA.

Recant oversees the JDC's international and nonsectarian projects, including the construction of the Agahozo-Shalom Youth Village in Rwanda, which the JDC is building to house orphans of that country's 1994 genocide.

A spike in gas prices over the past week resulting from the violence already has made the use of cars and buses difficult, Morarji said. Recant said he is concerned that the instability in Kenya will spark across-the-board price hikes.

Meanwhile, Kenya's small Jewish community seems unscathed by the violence.

Nairobi has 400 to 500 Jews — mostly British, Australian, Canadian and American expatriates. The community has a synagogue congregation that meets weekly, according to the director of Chabad of Central Africa, Rabbi Shlomo Bentolila.

Bentolila is stationed in the Democratic Republic of Congo, about a three-hour flight from Nairobi, but he arranges for Chabad rabbis to serve Nairobi's Jewish community on holidays. He said he has been in contact with Jews in Nairobi and in Mombasa, a resort town on Kenya's coast, where a dozen or so Jews live.

"There is some high tension," Bentolila said. "Kenya is a country which has always been stable. It's a country where there are no revolutions. It is a noble country where people go to work every day and come home at night. They are not used to revolutions."

"For the last few days, the country has been upside down, but in Nairobi it was only in the slums," he said.

In the residential part of town, where the Jews live, Bentolila said the streets were empty last week, but as the violence ebbed this week people began to return to their lives and livelihoods.

But, he cautioned, "They know things can turn in an instant."

During the height of the violence, the key to remaining safe was staying vigilant and trying to avoid hot spots, said Daniel Pollack, a 21-year-old senior at Queens College in New York, who was in Nairobi when the violence broke out.

Pollack, who had gone to distribute money he raised to help repair a school in Kibera, left Jan. 6 for Egypt. He said the U.S. Embassy told him to expect a war in Kenya.

"The embassy had called me and said stock up on food," Pollack told JTA.

"I saw a lot of destruction. I saw minivans burned out in the middle of the road, hundreds of shops burned and destroyed. When I would come home from Kibera, I would have to pick glass out of my shoes," he said.

Pollack said he did not feel threatened immediately, even though he was within a 10-minute walk of the violence, "but you had to be aware."

"I felt safe because I didn't put myself in harm's way," he said, "but I could have easily gotten killed."

Kenya has a history of calm in a volatile continent, with the country relatively immune to the tribal warfare that has torn apart other African nations. NGOs have used Nairobi, Kenya's capital, as a safe hub from which to dispatch aid workers and materials into nearby countries.

In one example of the ripple effect of the unrest in Kenya, contractors seeking to transport goods through the country to landlocked Rwanda say they may need to find alternate, and longer, routes for their goods. The price of concrete already has risen as a result.

"We have heard from our contractor that we should expect a rise in cost," Recant said. "If one pipeline breaks down, it has a ripple effect and everything is affected."

Recant said the JDC would not abandon the Agahozo-Shalom project, but it may have to scale it back because of rising costs.

"We might not have a library," he said.

Bush praises IDF strike

U.S. President George W. Bush was quoted as saying Israel's air strike in Syria last year was an "important preventive action." During his visit to Israel last week, Bush and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert discussed the Sept. 6 attack in northern Syria, Defense News reported Monday, citing a Jerusalem official who was briefed on the talks. The president said the mission, which many independent analysts believe targeted a nascent nuclear reactor, "was an important preventive action," according to the American magazine. Jerusalem and Washington have not given details on the bombing. Syria has denied having any secret nuclear facilities. Defense News reported that Israeli intelligence found no links between the alleged Syrian reactor and Iran.

Israel Briefs

progress toward peace, a Yediot Achronot poll found.

Seventy-seven per cent of Israelis do not believe Bush will bring diplomatic progress, as compared to 21 per cent who do, the poll found. Fifty-nine per cent of respondents said the visit would have no effect on Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's prospects ahead of the publication of a commission of inquiry's final report on the failings of the Second Lebanon War; 38 per cent said it would bolster the Israeli leader; and three per cent said it would weaken him. The poll had 500 respondents and a 4.5 per cent margin of error.

Diamond dealers killed

Five Israeli diamond dealers were killed in a plane crash in Namibia. Officials in Windhoek said Sunday that a light plane that crashed upon takeoff over the weekend was carrying five Israeli employees of the international diamond firm Lazare Kaplan International. The pilot also died. The Israeli Embassy in neighbouring South Africa sent a team to help recover and identify the remains.

U.S. erred

The United States erred in not bombing Auschwitz during the Holocaust, U.S. President George W. Bush said. Bush made the comment to U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice while viewing an exhibit at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem of U.S. aerial photographs of the Nazi concentration camps, according to the memorial's chairman, Avner Shalev. Shalev took Bush on an hour-long tour of the museum Friday; it was Bush's second visit to Yad Vashem. Avner reported that the president's eyes welled up with tears twice during the tour. "I wish as many people as possible would come to this place. It is a sobering reminder that evil exists, and a call that when evil exists we must resist it," Bush said. Bush laid a red, white and blue wreath at the centre's main memorial — a stone slab that covers ashes of Holocaust victims taken from six Nazi extermination camps.

Head of Judaic Studies, King David High School Vancouver, Canada

Sderot families sue Egypt

SDEROT — Ten families of Sderot residents whose relatives have been killed or seriously injured by Qassam rockets fired from Gaza have filed a lawsuit against the Egyptian government in Be'er Sheva District Court.

The complaint accuses Egypt of helping Palestinian terror groups to smuggle explosives and weapons into the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip.

The plaintiffs say the explosives are being used by terror groups to make the Qassam rockets being launched against the southern Israeli town of Sderot.

Since Israel's pullout from Gaza in 2005, Sderot has lived under continuous Qassam attacks. The plaintiffs contend that Egypt is helping Hamas, Fatah and Islamic Jihad to terrorize the entire Negev.

The plaintiffs say Cairo assists the terror groups by authorizing the smuggling of tons of explosives and thousands of weapons into Gaza. They also say Egypt allows group members to cross back and forth from Sinai into Gaza, giving them an open route to and from training bases in states such as Iran, Lebanon and Syria.

As well, they say Egypt assists the terrorist with their training in these countries, and that Egypt helps to smuggle tens of millions dollars from Iran into Gaza that's being used to finance terror attacks and to strengthen Hamas' control of the coastal territory.

The plaintiffs are being represented by attorney Nitsana Darshan-Leitner and are seeking $65 million (US) in compensation.

The lawsuit comes in the wake of increasing tension between Israel and Egypt regarding Egypt's role in assisting the terrorists' smuggling operations.

In recent weeks, Jerusalem and Cairo have exchanged public accusations. According to Israel, although Egypt is technically at peace with the Jewish state, it continues to try to weaken Israel and strengthen terror groups in Gaza.

After Israel withdrew from Gaza, Egypt agreed to police its border with Gaza. Its obligations include preventing hostile activity against Israel, including stopping smuggling operations.

Despite this, critics charge that Egypt is intentionally breaching the agreement and giving terror groups free passage to and from its territory.

The plaintiffs thus argue that there's no difference between the Egyptian government and the terror groups launching the Qassams, and that both are equally responsible for casualties in Sderot.

Austrian Jewish journalist wins legal victory

By SHELTON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Karl Pfeifer, a Jewish journalist who brought the wrath of Austria's right-wing forces upon himself after accusing an Austrian professor of defaming Jews, has won a legal victory in a celebrated case turning on anti-Semitism, freedom of expression and libel.

The European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg, France, recently acquitted him of causing the suicide of Prof. Werner Pfeifenberger.

"I feel vindicated," Pfeifer said in an interview last week. "I was optimistic. I expected the judges in Strasbourg to be fair."

But Pfeifer, who was editor of a Jewish community monthly magazine in Vienna when he challenged Pfeifenberger, admitted that the controversy took an emotional toll on him.

"It is important to fight anti-Semitism, even if one has many sleepless nights. Yet I am a standing rebuke to Austrians who are anti-Semites or those who tolerate anti-Semitism."

The case began in 1995, when Pfeifenberger, a political scientist who had taught at the University of Muenster in Germany, wrote an article for the yearbook of the far right-wing Austrian Freedom party. In it, he claimed that Jews had declared war on Germany in 1933 after Adolf Hitler was appointed chancellor.

Pfeifenberger also alleged that Jews had played a manipulative role in European history. In describing Jews as "the internationalists," Pfeifer noted, he resorted to "anti-Semitic jargon."

In Pfeifer's view, Pfeifenberger added insult to injury by claiming that Jews fomented a number of decisive historical events, including the 1789 French Revolution.

Irked by Pfeifenberger's claims, Pfeifer launched an attack on him in the pages of Die Gemeinde, a publication he edited from 1982 until his retirement in 1995.

Pfeifer, born in Baden bei Wien in 1928, fled Austria with his parents in 1938, following its annexation by Germany.

The Pfeifers then made their way to Palestine via Switzerland, Italy, Yugoslavia and Hungary. They were relatively fortunate, having lost 36 close relatives during the Holocaust.

Pfeifer fought with the Palmach during Israel's War of Independence. He left Israel in 1951 and returned to Austria, where he worked in the hotel business.

In 1979, he became a freelance journalist, writing mainly on human rights. After Pfeifer's piece in Die Gemeinde was published, Pfeifenberger sued him for libel and demanded the equivalent of $20,000 (US) in damages.

But in 1997 and 1998, two lower appeals courts and one high appeals court rejected Pfeifenberger's lawsuit.

On Feb. 15, 2000, after the Freedom party formed a coalition government with the People's party, Austria's attorney general opened criminal proceedings against Pfeifenberger, saying he had violated a law prohibiting Nazi activity.

Less than three months later, he committed suicide.

Shortly afterward, a weekly, Zur Zeit — which Pfeifer describes as an "anti-Semitic rag" — condemned the "Jewish journalist Karl Pfeifer" and claimed that the "manhunt" he conducted against Pfeifenberger had prompted him to take his life.

Subsequently, Pfeifer sued Zur Zeit for libel and its editor, Andreas Moeltzer, for slander and defamation of character. Pfeifer triumphed, but an appeals court judge ruled that Pfeifer had "moral" responsibility for Pfeifenberger's self-inflicted death.

In response, Pfeifer appealed to the European Court of Human Rights.

Late last year, it acquitted Pfeifer of complicity in Pfeifenberger's suicide and ordered the Austrian government to pay Pfeifer 5,000 euros in damages and 10,000 euros in court costs.

The ruling will become official next month, on Feb. 15, if there are no objections from any of the concerned parties.

Looking back, Pfeifer regrets that Pfeifenberger committed suicide. "Yes, of course," he said.

But he contends there was "no causal link" between his article and Pfeifenberger's death. "The European court decided I was right."

And while Pfeifer doesn't believe Pfeifenberger was a neo-Nazi, he suggests that he was a conspiracy theorist when it came to Jews.

Pfeifer is thankful that the Social Democrat party and the Greens supported him during his travails, and that the Jewish community rallied behind him in moral and material terms.

Karl Pfeifer

Hannah Lessing, who heads two Austrian government Holocaust restitution funds, is not surprised by Pfeifer's grit.

"He is a very credible man, a real fighter," she said in an interview from Vienna. "He has been threatened by right-wing extremists and still doesn't lie low. He is a real anti-fascist."

Florida Jews key after N.H. results

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NASHUA, N.H. — New Hampshire voters confirmed their reputation for independence last week, defying polls predicting a resounding defeat for the presidential candidate most favoured by U.S. Jews — and making Florida Jews key players in the races for both major parties.

New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who earned top favorability marks in a recent survey of American Jewish opinion, had gradually been overtaken in the polls by Illinois Senator Barack Obama in the days after his stunning victory in the Iowa Democratic caucuses, with some predicting a double-digit defeat that would have left her presidential prospects in peril. But last week, she edged Obama in a race so close that both campaigns were exuding confidence and promising to continue into the South and West, and on to states with significant Jewish populations.

On the Republican side, the victory by Arizona Senator John McCain ratcheted up the pressure on another Jewish favourite, former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, whose hopes now hinge on the Florida primary Jan. 29.

With Democrats and Republicans both picking different winners in Iowa and New Hampshire, it seems increasingly likely that the nation could again end up turning its collective eye to Jewish voters in South Florida.

The Sunshine State, which boasts the country's third-largest Jewish population, behind New York and California, is poised to provide a major momentum boost as the only state scheduled to hold a primary on Jan. 29, as well as the last to vote before Super Tuesday a week later.

Diving instructor submerges himself in Jewish education

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

At the age of 22, Jonathan Moneta is already the president of his own company.

The company, Chai Divers, offers scuba-diving courses that take place in Canada and Israel, and can easily be completed at the end of birthright Israel trips. The courses include lessons about Israeli naval and environmental history and incorporate Jewish themes and texts relevant to scuba diving.

Moneta started scuba diving with his father and brother when he was 12 and received his PADI [Professional Association of Diving Instructors] open water certification when he was 13. He said what he loves most about the sport is teaching it and interacting in an underwater atmosphere.

"You are in a whole different environment underwater," he said. "You can interact with life and objects underwater that you cannot interact with above water."

"[It causes] a feeling of physical weightlessness - almost like you're flying."

Another thing Moneta enjoys is that everyone is equal underwater, regardless of language or culture.

"It's a whole different way of interacting," he said. "It strengthens friendship and bonds. Scuba diving is a different way of communicating - everyone speaks the same language underwater."

Moneta, who is studying theatre in his final year at York University, recently spent a year on exchange at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. In his free time, he would visit Eilat and spend a lot of time scuba diving there. It was in Israel that he decided to become a certified dive instructor.

"In Eilat, there was always scuba diving going on somewhere. When I got back to Toronto, there was hardly anything. It was really depressing," he said.

Inspired by his participation in the August 2007 Conference on Alternatives in Jewish Education, Moneta saw the conference as an opportunity to get Chai Divers off the ground and get children and adults excited about learning about Judaism.

"Parents are not as involved in Jewish education as their kids," he said. "They have little communication with the teachers."

"Jewish education is more effective if there is interest in it in the home. Scuba diving is not only exciting for kids, but for parents as well."

"Everyone is a kid when they get underwater," he added.

Moneta, a Toronto native, attended Leo Baeck Day School and Associated Hebrew School. Growing up, he went to shul with his family on High Holy Days and Shabbat and was a member of the Temple Har Zion choir. Since returning from Israel, he makes an effort to attend synagogue on a regular basis.

Moneta said that while he is sometimes envious of people who know what their exact direction in life will be, he is content with what he is doing now.

"I really enjoy Chai Divers," he said. "It speaks to me spiritually."

When he is not keeping busy with Chai Divers, Moneta has many other interests that occupy his time. He has played the flute since he was in Grade 2 and is very involved with theatre, and pursuing acting. While at Hebrew University, he played the role of Tony in the Hillel production of West Side Story.

In Toronto, Moneta is involved with Vanier College Productions at York University.

Other passions of his include an interest in Jewish education and non-profit business management, two fields he is considering studying in graduate school.

Moneta's entrepreneurial spirit is evident in everything he does. He was the president of another company for three years, Student Solutions, a window and eavestrough cleaning company.

"I've always loved being in business, employing friends and dealing personally with customers and staff," he said.

In spite of the wide variety of activities Moneta participates in, what he enjoys most are the endeavours that keep him in touch with the Jewish community.

"Whatever I'm doing, I find that I enjoy my Jewish activities the most. My Jewish involvements always seem the most powerful in building relationships with friends and family," he said.

Those Jewish activities include assisting in organizing the volunteer-run 2008 Limmud Toronto festival - a one-day event of Jewish learning that includes topics such as Israel, history, spirituality and the arts.

In spite of his hectic schedule, Moneta manages to stay motivated, thanks in part to the support he gets from everyone involved with Chai Divers.

"As I continue to consult with Jewish educators about Chai Divers, I'm always met with excitement and encouragement - this has been key in motivating me," he said.

Also keeping him motivated are the educational features of his company.

"As I develop programs, I'm learning that experiential Jewish education can be powerful, not just for Jewish groups who seek an exciting day activity together, but for families looking to do something fun and Jewish," he said.

Moneta has big plans for expanding Chai Divers that he hopes to put in motion sooner rather than later.

"I would love to see Chai Divers develop long-term Jewish learning and dive training programs that meet biweekly or more frequently. I'm also working to make sure that, in addition to our local programs, our Israel training programs are well-known opportunities for everyone going to Israel," he said.

While he has many prospects for the future, one thing Moneta is sure of is that he wants Chai Divers to be a long-term initiative.

"Scuba diving is my lifelong passion and I hope it continues to be," he said.

Jonathan Moneta, left, and Ilan Hadar, are Moneta's counterpart in Israel for Chai Divers.

Screenwriter influenced by her superstitious grandmother

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Watching Love and Other Dilemmas, it is clear that screenwriter Deborah Peraya was influenced not only by the classic movies she watched growing up but also by the zaniness of her Jewish family.

Peraya's Russian grandparents, Sarah and Abe Bialowsky, came to Vancouver after the war. Peraya, 37, still lives in Vancouver. Her mother, Fay, was born in a refugee camp in Germany and delivered by an ex-Nazi doctor.

"My grandmother was larger than life," Peraya said. "She was also very superstitious, and I think that came out of growing up in Communist Russia. I was raised with all these superstitions like you never tell anyone what plane you are going on or you never kiss anyone goodbye in a doorway."

Love and Other Dilemmas, Peraya's first film, is about

Ginger Shapiro's wedding day. She's nine months pregnant, and she's been robbed, kidnapped, thinks her fiancé is dead and has until 5 p.m. to get married and break her family curse.

"It wasn't autobiographical, but I think the underlying themes came out of autobiographical issues that were going on for me at the time," Peraya says. "I was actually pregnant when I wrote this feature." Her daughter, Chiara, is now 6.

Peraya makes her living writing screenplays and scripts for television shows, including CTV's Robson Arms.

Many of the characters in Love and Other Dilemmas are Jewish.

Directed by Peraya's husband, Loreto Di Stefano, 38, the film's cast includes Gabrielle Miller, John Cassini, Stephen Lobo, Fred Ewanuick and Janet Wright.

"I wrote for Robson Arms on season one. I had seen Gabe (Miller) and Fred (Ewanuick) on set. We wanted to have a read-through so I could hear how the draft sounded, and we asked Gabe to be Ginger," Peraya says. "As soon as we heard her, it was never a question after that point that Gabrielle was Ginger for us. Fred was so brilliantly funny — he plays Emmett, the guy who kidnaps Ginger on her wedding night."

Peraya wanted her film to have a screwball sensibility, reminiscent of the classic comedies she had watched with her family. It was also important to her that the couple in her film be Jewish because in the movies she saw as a child everybody got married in churches, and that wasn't the reality of the weddings she went to. She wondered why a couple in a movie couldn't get married in a synagogue, as they do in her film.

"I think for me, it [her film] had to come from a truth I knew," Peraya says.

She adds that she doesn't like cruel comedy, which she avoids. "I don't think comedy needs to poke fun at people — it can poke fun at situations and problems. I think it is much more fun if we can laugh because we recognize those things in our own cultures and our own lives. I'm always aware of that when I'm writing. I'm not malicious in the comedy."

Peraya and Di Stefano married 10 years ago on April Fool's Day. This is Di Stefano's first directing effort. He usually works in film post-production and was involved in the post-production of Chocolat, whose cast included Johnny Depp.

"Working with my husband was really fun. Our skills are very different, he's a director — a far more visual person than I am — and the ways in which we challenge each other are actually complementary. Most of the time it was great," Peraya says.

Love and Other Dilemmas premiered at the Vancouver Film Festival in October 2006 and is opening in selected Canadian cities on Feb. 1.

'Schmelvis' releases comic techno album

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

"I am not an Elvis impersonator" intones Dan Hartal on the first track of his new album, Techno Lime Party. In the context of the album's lyric-heavy electronica, the claim may seem obvious, but ironically, it's not actually true.

Hartal, a Montreal musician and songwriter, is in fact best known as Schmélvis, the Canadian Jewish Elvis impersonator. But as Techno Lime Party makes clear, Hartal's talents don't end at sequenced jumpsuits and big sideburns.

Over the course of 15 years and six albums, Hartal has never been afraid to reinvent himself. Born in Israel and raised since the age of eight in Montreal, Hartal pursued degrees in philosophy and education at Concordia University before turning professionally to music.

"Music is in my blood," Hartal said. "I always feel like I have to create and that's what drives me to it. It's so imbedded in me that I cannot escape it. It's the best way for me to express myself — otherwise I feel bottled up."

His first album, 1993's Meeting You, released under the pseudonym Herschel Fromme, was a classic exercise in bluesy, guitar-driven rock 'n' roll, and his critically acclaimed 1997 followup, Music for the Masses, further demonstrated his strong songwriting abilities.

Hartal's life and music took a turn, however, when people started pointing out that he bore an uncanny resemblance to Elvis Presley. Always open to new ideas, Hartal decided to run with the idea and started performing for the residents of retirement homes as Schmélvis.

"If you mix schtick with Elvis, it becomes Schmélvis," Hartal said, explaining his choice of moniker. "People just feel so good when they see an Elvis impersonator walk through the room," he added. "I don't know if it's the jumpsuit or the glasses or the whole persona — it's an honour to be an Elvis impersonator or an Elvis tribute artist."

While the idea of a Jewish Elvis might seem far-fetched, according to genealogical research published in a 1998 Wall Street Journal article, the King may actually have been Jewish. Though Presley never openly acknowledged his Jewish background, he once performed with a chai symbol around his neck and contributed to the Memphis Jewish community for years.

Upon learning of Elvis' Jewish connection and Hartal's Jewish-flavoured tribute act, Montreal filmmaker Max Wallace decided to explore further. The ensuing documentary, Searching for the King's Jewish Roots, was released in 2002. It followed Hartal as he made the journey to Graceland to say Kaddish for Presley on Aug. 16, the anniversary of his death. Mingling with thousands of other Elvis fans who had come to pay their respects, Hartal gained a new appreciation for Presley's life and work.

"A lot of people can poke fun at Elvis and say he was this fat, peanut-butter-banana-eating, drug-induced individual who died on the toilet, but this guy was an awesome individual," Hartal said. "Thousands of people flock to his grave site. Elvis had a self-searching purpose, and he wanted to bring peace on earth. He's definitely an inspiration, and we see it in his fan base."

While Hartal hasn't left behind his Schmélvis persona, Techno Lime Party represents his efforts to break new ground, musically and professionally.

"I'm much more of a rock 'n' roll kind of musician," Hartal said of his foray into electronic music. "I grew up idolizing people like the Beatles and the Doors and Led Zeppelin, and this is a project way out there."

In addition to providing all of the vocals and playing all of the instruments on the album, Hartal mastered and produced the album himself.

"I always wanted to do something independently," he said. "For me, doing this project was one of those challenges. I was not only going to do all the instruments but also record it at home and master the CD. It's one of these projects where I overcame the machine — a very fulfilling experience."

Not all is different, however. At heart, Hartal is a born entertainer, and his feel-good approach is evident in the album's comic lyrics.

"I'm a feel-good, positive individual," Hartal said. "Anybody can be negative. The essential magic in this world is to see the beauty, and that's what I always look for."

Herzl House museum named for founder of political Zionism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

HULDA, Israel — The fine Ottoman-style building is clad with Jerusalem stone and adorned with green shutters.

It exudes an aristocratic air, as if it was once a seat of royalty.

This impression is reinforced by the path leading to the house. It is lined with regal palm trees.

What could be more majestic?

On the left side of the dwelling is a prominent mural of a bearded man in formal 19th century black attire, his arms folded in contemplation.

The person in question, Theodor Herzl (1860-1904), was a Budapest-born Viennese journalist whose visionary books, The Jewish State and The Old New Land, paved the way for modern political Zionism, a movement that irretrievably altered and still influences the geopolitics of the Middle East.

In these works, Herzl envisaged a socialist utopia, a new Jewish society underpinned by science and technology and inhabited by Jews and Arabs co-existing in peace and harmony.

Herzl, having visited Palestine only once, died long before his dream materialized. But in a remarkable observation, he predicted that a Jewish state would arise in Palestine in the late 1940s.

Although the building is named after the godfather of Zionism, the man himself did not live in Herzl House, which is a museum today.

Nor did he visit the outlying lands of what would be the Herzl Forest, the Jewish National Fund's first-ever afforestation project.

Since then, the Jewish National Fund — which was founded in 1901 — has planted more than 220 million trees and purchased land and serviced it for settlement.

The story of Herzl House mirrors the history of Israel.

After Herzl's untimely death, the Jewish National Fund launched a campaign to purchase land for a farm.

In 1909, an olive plantation was established and a residence built in Herzl's honour. The farm was administered by an agronomist, Louis Brisch, who allocated the second floor for himself and the lower level for his workers.

Since Brisch did not get on well with his labourers, he was replaced by another agronomist, Louis Wilkansky.

In an attempt to create a mixed agrarian economy, he augmented the olive grove with fruit trees, woodland species, scrubland, field crops, dairy herds and chicken runs.

Most of Wilkansky's workers fled or were evicted by the Ottoman Turks during World War I.

The ones who remained faced water shortages and a locust plague. After the war and the British conquest, still more Jews settled in the vicinity.

The farm, a training centre for Jewish pioneers, was attacked by Arabs when riots erupted in Palestine in 1929. A Haganah commander, Ephraim Chizik, was killed during these communal disturbances.

Two years later, a group of Jews from Poland, members of the Gordonia youth movement, arrived to revive the farm.

They came under Arab attack during the Arab Revolt, which lasted from 1936 to 1939, and left the site to form Kibbutz Hulda, about one kilometre to the west.

When the 1948 War of Independence broke out, the road from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem was blocked by Arab forces. The kibbutz served as a base for Jewish fighters trying to break the siege.

Herzl House, meanwhile, fell into a state of disrepair. But in 1998, when Israel marked its 50th anniversary, the building was renovated thanks to the generosity of a Toronto man, John Sereny, who donated the funds in honour of his parents.

The renovation was carried out by the Jewish National Fund in conjunction with the Council for the Preservation of Buildings and Historical Sites, the Nature Reserves and the National Parks Authority.

Herzl House, 10 kilometres southeast of the university town of Rehovot, contains a small exhibit of historical artifacts, notably an excerpt from The Old New Land and a copy of the manuscript in Herzl's own hand.

In the excerpt, a character describes his impression of Palestine in doleful terms: "Over the distant horizon loomed the deforested hills of Judea. The bare slopes and the bleak, rocky valleys showed few traces of present or former cultivation. This country needs nothing but water and shade to have a very great future."

A fairly informative 10-minute film elaborates on this theme.

Herzl House, whose day-to-day operations are run by members of Kibbutz Hulda, is open seven days a week from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. Entrance is free.

This year, Israel's 60th anniversary of statehood, is as good a time as any to visit Herzl House.

It drives home the point that Israel's birth was exceedingly difficult, that much progress has been achieved since then, and that Israel, in the deepest sense of the word, remains a work in progress.

VIVIAN FELSEN PRESENTS ILLUSTRATED TOUR OF PALE OF SETTLEMENT

Visual artist, historian and translator Vivian Felsen presents a virtual guided tour of the Jewish Pale of Settlement, the region of Czarist Russia to which Jews were restricted. Co-sponsored by Friends of Yiddish and the Toronto Workmen's Circle, Felsen presents "A Journey Through the Pale," a lecture on what Jewish writer Nathan Ausubel once called a "gigantic ghetto."

Using colour slides to illustrate her themes, Felsen discusses the Pale from its creation in the 18th century to its demise during the Russian Revolution, examining why it came into being, its role in Yiddish culture and its significance for us today. Free for Friends of Yiddish and Workmen's Circle members; $5 for guests. Workmen's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. W. Sunday, Jan. 20, 2 p.m.

Post-Holocaust Drama: Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company presents the powerful drama, The Action Against Sol Schumann, by Jeffrey Sweet. Set in New York, Washington, D.C., and Toronto, the drama depicts two brothers' quest for the truth about their father, Sol, a Holocaust survivor, accused, decades after the Holocaust, of being a sadistic kapo in a German labour camp.

The play is based on a U.S. Office of Special Investigations case against Jacob Tannenbaum, a kapo who was alleged to have been brutal to Jews under his charge.

"Sweet has written a masterful study of one family's descent into emotional chaos, as Sol struggles to defend his war-time activities, and his sons are torn apart by some shocking revelations," said director Michael Ryval.

The play is unconventional in that the action is spread across 25 scenes and the cast of 11, who portray 15 characters, remains on stage throughout the entire performance. "It's inspired by Brechtian dramas, and the actors work collectively in narrating the story of Sol Schumann and his sons," Ryval said. "The end result is heart-rending."

The Stagecraft production features Ron Boyd, Susanne Egler, Heather Finestone, Karen Garmaise, Alan Gordon, Anna Grosman, Harry Hochman, Judy Kent, Eric Kirsh, Tal Maissner and Glenda Mindlin. $15, $10. Holy Blossom Temple, Eisendrath Auditorium, 1950 Bathurst St. Thursday, Jan. 24, and Saturday, Jan. 26, at 8 p.m., and Sunday, Jan. 27, 2:30 p.m. 416-789-3291, ext. 511

There's no creaky mahogany either, no old brass lamps or musty smell. "We are a little more modern here," says Martha Lichtenstein, president of the island's Jewish community, "and more Ashkenazi."

It's worth prying yourself off one of Aruba's many pristine beaches to visit the plain little synagogue in Oranjestad, the capital. Opened in 1962, well after most other Caribbean shuls, it's a microcosm of the country itself, which is indeed more modern and western than the neighbouring islands of the Dutch Antilles.

Beth Israel may be a world's difference from the grandiose Mikvé Israel-Emanuel in Curaçao, the oldest continually functioning synagogue in the western hemisphere, but it possesses a quaintness that makes it worth dropping by on a Friday night or Saturday (there's no daily minyan).

An autonomous country that broke off from the Netherlands Antilles in 1986 over a taxation/revenue dispute, it is still part of the Dutch kingdom. Aruba tallies about 100 Jews, and the synagogue counts about 40 local family members. Its real strength lies in an overseas membership of 185. On any given Shabbat, visiting North Americans outnumber locals, and life-cycle ceremonies by foreigners are popular.

Aruba was claimed in 1499 by the Spanish, who dismissed it as "a useless island" and used it to store their horses. It was acquired by the Dutch in 1636.

As with many places in the Caribbean, Aruban Jews can trace the community's lineage to one person, in this case, Moses Solomon Levie Maduro, a prominent member of a Sephardic Portuguese family in Curaçao who established a branch of the Dutch West Indies Company in Aruba in 1754.

Lichtenstein notes that Maduro brought his own slaves and spurned the slave trade that was a focal point of the economy in Curaçao.

Unlike their more pious brethren in Curaçao, Aruban Jews strayed from a traditional Jewish lifestyle. After 1924, a large group from Poland settled here. They were joined in the 1930s by Jews from Suriname, who came to work at the Esso oil refinery.

In 1942, the community created the Jewish Country Club on Palm Beach. Four years later, it was officially recognized as a centre for worship and where weddings and bar mitzvahs were held. But it closed by the early 1960s, replaced by a new synagogue.

Today, while Sephardi surnames such as Maduro, Robles, Nassy, Lopez, and Henriquez can still be found, there are also the more Germanic sounding Lichtenstein, Pick and Gottfried.

There's no general demand for kosher food. A kosher deli opened for tourists at a resort in 2005, but didn't last.

Until recently, the community had a fulltime rabbi, but since he decamped for Florida, there's a search for a new one. A cantor who departed in 2002 had initiated an adult education program to help unaffiliated Jews and those in interfaith marriages. There's a monthly newsletter, Chadashot Beth Israel.

Lichtenstein, who was born in Buenos Aires and came to Aruba in 1967, has a grievance heard commonly in these parts: Young people are leaving, mostly to study in Holland and the United States, and not returning.

"We are like a train station," she sighs. "People stay for a while, then leave." She's optimistic that the establishment of a law and medical school on the island will keep young people here.

There's no anti-Semitism and relations with Israel are "excellent," says Lichtenstein, who doubles as Israel's honorary consul. Arubans, in the Dutch tradition, are unusually tolerant, she says, and nearly everyone speaks four languages: Dutch, Spanish, English and Papiamentu, a lilting Spanish-Portuguese-Dutch-English dialect, with some African patois thrown in.

Recently, the government announced it would revamp its emergency services, and asked Lichtenstein to tap Israel's expertise. A delegation from Magen David Adom came to Aruba with ideas.

A small cemetery in town, with tombstone names dating to 1563, is the sole physical evidence of the historic Jewish presence in Aruba over the centuries.

Historian studies phenomenon of conversion in Germany

How Jews Became Germans: The History of Conversion and Assimilation in Berlin by Deborah Hertz, Yale University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Karl Marx, Felix Mendelssohn and Heinrich Heine, three of the most illustrious Germans of the 19th century, apparently had little in common.

Marx, born in Trier in 1818, was a political economist and revolutionary whose radical ideas about capitalism and a classless society spawned communism.

Mendelssohn, born in Hamburg in 1809, was a conductor and pianist whose symphonies define the Romantic era in classical music.

Heine, born in Düsseldorf in 1797, was a poet whose lyric verse still resonates and moves Germans today.

While they were very different, they shared an alienation from their Jewish roots. Mendelssohn and Heine were converts to Christianity, while Marx hailed from a family that had already converted.

Conversion was not an uncommon phenomenon in the 19th century, when German Jews, still facing a myriad of anti-Semitic myths and restrictions that played havoc with their hopes, ambitions, dreams and careers, took the easy way out and converted to Christianity.

As Heine once famously said, conversion was his "ticket of admission into European culture."

Heine's dictum had its effect. By the 20th century, close to one million Christians in Germany were of Jewish origin.

Shortly after that, rabid racist Adolf Hitler assumed power in January 1933, and the new Nazi government announced laws that required all citizens to document their genealogy in full.

Determined to establish a racial state in which Jews would have no place, the Nazi regime sought to identify Christians whose ancestors had been Jewish.

Enlisting the aid of the country's churches, the race-obsessed Nazis created the Judenkartei, a repository of conversion and intermarriage records stretching back to the mid-17th century.

Deborah Hertz's book, How Jews Became Germans: The History of Conversion and Assimilation in Berlin, burrows into that issue by probing the lives of Jews who jettisoned Judaism and opted for Christianity in their eagerness for acceptance.

Hertz, a professor of modern Jewish history at the University of California in San Diego, focuses on a gallery of Jews within the context of German society. She does so by exploring letters, diaries and other materials.

Among her subjects, apart from Mendelssohn, Heine and Marx, are Rahel Levin Varnhagen (1771-1833), a Berliner who hosted one of the most celebrated literary salons in Europe; Friedrich Julius Stahl (1802-1861), an ecclesiastical lawyer and politician from Munich; and Karl Ludwig Borne (1786-1837), a political writer from Frankfurt am Main who was born as Loeb Baruch.

Varnhagen, whose father was a prosperous banker and jeweller, converted in 1814 prior to her marriage to a Prussian diplomat. To Varnhagen, a self-hating Jew, conversion came as a great relief.

Her friend, the Prussian nationalist Johann Fichte, was opposed to granting Jews civil rights. His mentor, the historian Friedrich Ruhs, subscribed to a wholly ethnic view of nationhood in which even converted Jews could not aspire to be true Germans. Ruhs' philosophy would be adopted by Hitler and company.

Stahl, whose original name was Jolson, was baptized into the Lutheran church at 19. A church activist and a professor of law, he was known for his opposition to allowing unconverted Jews to hold civil service posts.

Borne, a convert to Lutheranism who studied constitutional law and political science, left Judaism in 1818. According to Hertz, he regarded Christianity "as integral to his identification with German national culture."

During the 17th century, the majority of converts were poor and remained impoverished. But by the middle of the 18th century, she observes, "we meet richer converts and more extended family conversions."

Since innumerable converts were wealthy, their departure deprived Berlin's Jewish community of part of its operating budget.

Hertz says that "a huge proportion" of converts were infants whose parents wanted to spare them "conflicts" later in life. She adds that 60 per cent of converts between 1800 and 1874 were under the age of five.

Conversion was a tempting proposition because neither wealth nor special privileges could guarantee social acceptance in Christian circles.

Yet converts who married each other proved that baptism was not always a step on the journey to real integration, she notes.

In an intriguing aside, Hertz points out that some Jewish assimilationists delayed conversion to dabble with Reform Judaism. Having concluded that it was unsuitable, they took the final plunge.

She reminds readers, lest they need such reminders, that conversion was a temptation to some because Prussia's treatment of Jews was dismal in comparison to the status of Jews in France.

The 1791 French Revolution emancipated Jews, but emancipation did not reach Germany until its unification in 1871 after the Franco-Prussian War.

Still, even in the wake of this watershed, German Jews flirted with conversion, a topic Hertz virtually ignores.

Faced with the fact that considerable numbers of Germans were of Jewish descent, the Nazis played God, deciding who was and who was not a certified Aryan.

As Hertz writes, "Just how many Jewish ancestors made a descendant Jewish was a topic of intense debate during the Third Reich. Surprising as it might sound, in the beginning, in 1933, the definition of who was a non-Aryan was actually broader than it became in 1935. According to the first set of regulations issued in 1933, the non-Aryan category included quarter, half, three-quarter and full Jews. Later, after the Nuremberg Laws of September 1935, all of the quarter Jews and some of the half Jews were removed from the non-Aryan category and declared to be functionally Aryans."

The Nazis, of course, made their determination on the basis of the 60-odd narrow rectangular black volumes that comprised the Judenkartei. Hertz, having examined them in voluminous detail, avoids moral judgments about the converts until the end of her interesting book. "They wanted distinguished careers, loving marriages, a bountiful social life and an inner identity as Germans," she states. "They could not wait for history to bring them authentic emancipation."

But having given the converts their due, she admits that she progressively lost her sympathy for them as she stumbled upon episodes of "apparent hypocrisy, self-hatred and crass self-promotion."

Israel deals compassionately with physically and mentally disabled

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
 Staff Reporter

OFKIM, Israel — A society can best be judged by the way it treats its weakest and most vulnerable members. By that criteria, Israel gets a high score in terms of its compassionate care of the physically and mentally disabled.

Aleh Negev and the Tlalim Institute, two of the most advanced institutions of their kind, are on the front lines of dealing with this issue in Israel.

Aleh Negev, a rehabilitative village for the severely disabled, opened in 2006 on the outskirts of this development town of 24,000 in southern Israel.

Situated opposite a lush field of peppers, Aleh Negev is a link in a chain of Aleh residential facilities caring for children and adults suffering from medical conditions ranging from cerebral palsy to autism. Founded in 1982, Aleh also has branches in Jerusalem, Bnei Brak and Gedera.

Already partially operational, Aleh Negev is a complex of of dun-coloured buildings and beautifully landscaped grounds whose infrastructure was laid out by the Jewish National Fund.

Aleh Negev currently has 70 residents, said Sarah Herskowitz, a spokesperson. Once fully operational, it will provide 220 people with a home, schooling, employment, medical care and opportunities for social interaction.

It will also provide 12,000 outpatient services annually to the entire area.

Designed to create a safe and homey atmosphere for its residents, many of whom come from families that lack the financial means or the time to adequately look after their children, Aleh Negev is dedicated to helping them achieve a greater degree of independence.

Staffed by a cadre of professionals and caregivers who tend to their needs from morning to night, Aleh Negev has set new benchmarks in the field of special education, offering therapeutic treatments in occupational therapy, physiotherapy, speech therapy, music therapy and so on.

As a result, it has attracted the attention of experts from around the world.

Yet a visitor unaccustomed to being in the presence of the physically and mentally disabled is struck by their plight. One sees residents in wheelchairs, their heads slumped sideways, their tongues sticking out, their arms curled inward. But elsewhere, hope springs eternal as a group of residents sit at a table and grapple with mental exercises.

The chair of Aleh Negev, Doron Almog, a general in the Israeli army reserves, is a man who has first-hand knowledge in coping with the disabled.

His late son, Eran, was severely handicapped, and during his brief life, he neither spoke nor ever stopped behaving like an infant.

Eran, who died at the age of 23, was named after Almog's brother, who died to death next to a burning tank during the Yom Kippur War. "I swore that I would never leave a bleeding soldier behind," said Almog. "We all swore that we would never abandon our son Eran."

"Eran lived at home until he was 13," said Herskowitz. "At that point, the Almogs realized that, as Eran approached his teen years, he would need the intense stimulation and social environment that a specialized care facility could offer."

He was placed in Aleh's facility in Gedera, the first with a teen program. "I wanted to create [for him] a beautiful world, challenging yet surrounded and protected with the warmth of true love," he explained.

"Doron was looking for a long-term solution," said Herskowitz. "It would offer Eran and his friends a quality of life through adulthood, including residential living, work opportunities, paramedical services, social events and recreation appropriate for older children. In this context, Aleh Negev was born."

Having been involved in Aleh Negev from its inception, he regards it as something of a temple, a village that will create "a future of hope and will be a source of pride for humanity."

The Tlalim Institute, a facility in nearby Dimona founded in 1975, resembles a kibbutz. A small park, built by the Jewish National Fund, adds to that bucolic impression, as does a colony of stray cats.

Aleh Negev. Inset: Nilli Ben-Dor

One hundred and sixteen caregivers, including doctors, nurses and social workers, attend to 234 mentally challenged adults from ages 20 to 76.

The residents are unusually outgoing and friendly. In child-like fashion, they are eager to shake your hand and ask for your name.

But one man, tall and gangly, was in an agitated state because he had not had visitors lately.

Residents regard visitors as crucially important, said the director, Nilli Ben-Dor, who holds an MA degree in special education.

When elderly parents or siblings are no longer able or willing to keep in regular touch with them, she assigns "aunts," or volunteers, to visit them.

But on this particular day, much to the distress of one of the residents, his "aunt" had not showed up.

Residents are kept busy in leisure time activities such as dancing and gardening.

If they need to be calmed down, they have access to two "snooze rooms."

As on a kibbutz, they take their meals in a common dining hall.

About half of the residents work part of the day, placing candles in boxes and wrapping forks and knives in napkins. Seventy-five residents do not work, being immobile.

Two doctors and an equal number of nurses look after their routine medical problems. In case of serious ailments, they are sent to a hospital in Be'er Sheva. Dimona, a town of about 40,000 southeast of Be'er Sheva, has no hospital. "It's a big problem," said Ben-Dor.

Otherwise, the residents of the Tlalim Institute seem to lack nothing. As Ben-Dor said, "Israel takes good care of its disabled population."

Pressel made history in 2007 as youngest ever LPGA winner

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — While most 18-year-old athletes are just aiming to get better in their sports, golfer Morgan Pressel has twice made history despite her young age.

Pressel's first brush with history came in 2001 when she became the youngest golfer ever to qualify for the U.S. Women's Open as a 12-year-old.

It didn't take that long for Pressel to make history again. In March, at 18 years and 10 months, Pressel became the youngest golfer ever to win a major championship by finishing first at the Kraft Nabisco Championships in Rancho Mirage, California.

Pressel was in shock and in tears after winning the $300,000 (US) championship prize. Though she birdied her final hole and finished with a three-under-par 289, she trailed Suzann Patterson of Norway by four shots while Patterson was playing behind on the 14th hole.

But Patterson self-destructed with bogeys to lose her lead and finish one stroke behind Pressel.

"Oh my God, I really did not expect this," Pressel said. "I trailed, thought I had an opportunity but did not really expect to win when I finished."

"I went shopping to celebrate, got a few purses, and enjoyed celebrating the Passover seder with my whole family at my grandparents' home. It was so much fun to go through this experience, and I hope it is the first of many major championships in my career," she said.

Yet, what works well in golf on one day does not always work well on another. Pressel closed out the 2007 season on a disappointing note at the $1.4-million U.S. ADT Championship in West Palm Beach, tying for ninth with a three-under-par 211 after three rounds of play.

Pressel was superb in the second round, making five consecutive birdies in the final nine holes for a seven-under-par 65, but shot a 73 the next day.

"You sometimes need to [be] knocked around once in a while to get better in golf or any other sport. Morgan has a long career in front of her and disappointment is part of the process," said Pressel's grandfather, Herb Krickstein.

Having Krickstein by her side is one of the many reasons Pressel has shined at such an early age. Krickstein has been accompanying Morgan on the pro circuit along with Morgan's grandmother, Esther, for the past year and has been a mentor to Morgan since she took up the game at age eight.

For Krickstein, mentoring a young athlete was a case of deja vu. More than 20 years ago, his son Aaron, at age 16, made history by becoming the youngest champion to win a pro tennis title — in Tel Aviv — in 1983. Aaron Krickstein was a world top 10 tennis player from 1983-94, ranked as high as sixth in 1990.

"It is not a fluke for this to happen twice," said Martin Hall, Pressel's golf instructor. "Herb Krickstein is a man with a vision. He knows how to recognize talent at a young age, and also when to push the kids and when not to."

"Both Aaron and Morgan never had to be pushed to achieve what they accomplished. They both are willing to work hard to reach their goals and know they have to sacrifice to reach their goals," Krickstein said.

Pressel is so adept at golf that she turned down a scholarship at Duke University to turn pro in 2006, despite being an academic honours student at St. Andrews High School in Boca Raton, Fla.

Many former golf stars, such as LPGA Tour Hall of Famer Amy Alcott, think Pressel may be destined to be one of the giants in women's golf.

Alcott, who saw Pressel play at the Kraft Nabisco Championship, told Pressel she would be enshrined as the champion just before she ended her final hole with a birdie. A few minutes later, Alcott's prediction came true.

"I saw her win and saw how cool she is under pressure. Morgan is a marvelous young talent who will win many majors on the LPGA tour and her future is very bright. It would not surprise me if Morgan may become the youngest person to be inducted into the LPGA Hall Of Fame," Alcott said.

Maccabees compete in hockey tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Israeli Maccabees finished respectfully, though out of the medals, in a holiday tournament sponsored by the Canadian Multicultural Hockey League (CMHL).

The Maccabees included skaters who played for Israel's national junior team and the Canadian entry at the World Jewish Cup in Metulla last summer. They won two and lost two, one of them in overtime, to score five points in the CMHL's eastern division.

The Maccabees defeated Hellenic Lightning 2-1 and lost to Japanese Arashi 5-4 in their overtime games. They added a regulation time 5-0 win over the Scottish Marauders and matched that with a 2-0 loss to the Irish Shamrocks.

The Polish Hussars were the Canadian Cup winners, defeating Nubian Kings 3-2 in the championship final.

The Maccabees, which played three of its four games at North York Centennial (Herb Carnegie) Arena, shared a division with the Arashi, Shamrocks and Lightning, along with Macedonian Lions, Chinese Ice Dragons and Serbian White Eagles. Other communities represented in the tournament came from the Italian, Ukrainian, Korean, Maltese, Aboriginal and Portuguese communities.

Altogether 34 teams in four divisions — including a women's section — participated in the tournament.

The CMHL winter tournament is the brainchild of television executive producer Stanley Papulaks, who conceived of the idea 25 years ago but only launched the first event three years ago. The CMHL is a dream come true for Papulaks, who himself is the son of immigrant parents, the event's website (www.cmhl.ca) said.

The Maccabees were led by P. Sachetti in goal (he allowed eight goals in four games) and had skaters Ron Berman, Stacey Britstone, Mike Ceresne, N. Ceresney, Dave Faber, Jaime Klaxman, Mikki Levy, Cody Schindermann, Elliot Shully, Mitch Sodofsky, Daniel Spivak, Shane Urowitz, Adam Weinberg, Jordan Weinberg, Kevin Willer and Ziv Zukier.

Britstone participated in the World Jewish Cup and has played with the Plymouth Whalers and the Tillsonburg Vipers in the OHA Senior League. Berman and Spivak have played for the Israeli juniors several times.

Don't forget: WORTHY

Resolution No. 26

I've got a healthy Jewish spirit. On Friday nights, you'll find me romantically dining by candlelight with the Shabbat Queen.

That said, I could get right behind most secular holidays, too. I'm a fan of good marketing. For example, I love "the spirit" of Christmas. It's the one time of year when everyone I meet is courteous. They should just call the holiday "Courteous" – all the songs would still work. Of course the day after, it's back to road rage Wednesdays, but that's to be expected.

In the spirit of "when in Rome," this January, I'd like to extend a Happy "neither-Chinese-nor-Hebrew-calendar" New Year's to you all.

As I understand it, you'd like to eat more from column A and less from column B. You want to quit something and start something else.

We're three weeks in. How's that going?

Not great? Don't feel bad. It took me four years to get this next one off the ground. In 2004, I undressed my career in front of the mirror. It didn't have the definition I wanted – things were sagging. So I decided to send my skill set to boot camp and resolved to make a feature film from the bottom up.

On Jan. 30, that film, Summerhood, will premiere at the Santa Barbara International Film Festival.

Four years. That's some diet. I'd often measure myself against the efforts and accomplishments of friends and family, but this was my resolution.

Be mindful of the goals you set. Results do come in time, but time can take four years. Patience is a combination of managed expectations and DVD box sets.

Maybe we shouldn't compare our goals to others. My sister had two babies while I worked on this film. Two babies. Talk about glowing validation from Saba and Bubbie. My verbal art piece versus her biological enterprises – hard to compete with. Mind you, mine is a totally original work while hers, though crowd-pleasing, are merely reproductions. Plus, she only co-authored that deal.

Either way, it's still a lot to compete with. And now that even my mother surfs the Internet, I'm in desperate need of a tangible, Googleable accomplishment.

It took me four years to keep this resolution, and every year Dick Clark was there to remind me that I had not yet reached my goal.

These were trying times. With deadlines looming, I dug in deep this year, committed to completing the odyssey. Getting two hours of sleep a night through the final weeks of post-production, my body – not unexpectedly – buckled, and I got my first cold in decades.

My father's last words of 2007 were, "You disgust me."

He asked me late on a Sunday afternoon to go buy chicken soup. It wasn't going to fit into my Sunday schedule, however. I'd planned to be bathing in chicken broth on Monday, but this wasn't soon enough for his liking, and so he was disgusted with me. Which had me curious: of all the offensive things I did last year – and they did add up – this by no means seemed disgusting enough to elicit the camel's bite, yet it seemed to be the straw that broke his back.

As of the end of 2007, I am disgusting. I can't even get myself soup. And even though I managed to do so hours later, in 2007, I disgusted my father, which I figure is par for the course.

I hope that this year, with soup in my belly and with Summerhood, my heartfelt film, on screens, I will have earned back my place at the family table with my sister, her two babies, my father's bike trip around Israel and my mother's new laptop skills.

Heaven knows that my body needs the nutrition.

So, if your ambitions are deeply rooted, don't give up. Some goals take more than 30 days.

And if you find yourself in Santa Barbara on Jan. 30 at 7:30 p.m., consider yourself invited to my finish line.

MOLTEN CHOCOLATE SURPRISE

Ingredients

- 4 squares Semi-Sweet Chocolate
- 2 whole eggs
- 12 Chocolate Chip Cookies
- 1/2 c. thawed frozen Whipped Topping
- 1/2 c. butter
- 2 egg yolks
- 1 c. icing sugar
- 1/2 c. flour

Directions

PREHEAT oven to 425°F. Microwave chocolate and butter in large bowl on HIGH 2 min. or until butter is melted. Stir until chocolate is completely melted and mixture is well blended. You've made the decision and this year you are going to stick to it.

You are going to get up every morning and walk for an hour, no matter what.

You are going to join a gym – yes, this year you are going to do it.

You are going to eat healthier, feel better and lose weight. That's what you told yourself last year.

This year, I'd like to help you make that decision and stick to it. Making the decision to live an active life is easy – sticking to it isn't.

It's time to get to it

Most people set unrealistic goals for themselves and are sure to fail. I always tell my clients to take things one step at a time. If you've never exercised in your life, then starting with 30 minute walks inside or out is enough to help you lose weight and feel great.

I also strongly suggest that if you're new to working out or you have an injury of any kind, hire a personal trainer to show you the proper way to exercise safely and effectively.

If the gym is more your thing, then do it there. Gyms have lots of personal trainers with different levels of experience. Join with a friend, or join a class or two, especially for cardio training, because most people find it boring.

Make sure that the programs you choose are safe for you to do, and if you're not sure, ask your doctor. If you're a beginner, stick with beginner classes.

One of the biggest trends today is to share a personal trainer, or have group sessions, as they are called. Having two to four friends share an hour can make it more affordable, fun and motivating.

Start off with something you enjoy, because if you enjoy it, you will do it, and actually doing it will get you to where you want to go.

I'd like to help you reach your goal this year. E-mail me at felycesfitness@rogers.com with any questions or topics that you'd like to know more about.

Now go get started.

The new year, 2008, has arrived and the killing, raping and pillaging continues in Darfur, Sudan.

Basically, the world is full of it when it comes to halting this war.

In a recent article in the Wall Street Journal, actress and activist Mia Farrow wrote about Darfur – a place she has visited seven times – that "the world seems content to look on in silence. The diplomatic pressure needed to end [Sudanese President Omar] Bashir's pattern of obstruction is nowhere to be found."

Farrow, in referring to a "pattern of obstruction," is speaking about United Nations Resolution 1769, which authorized the deployment of 26,000 peacekeepers to defend the millions of people who are in danger in Sudan's Darfur region.

Bashir has stated categorically that he will deny entry to peacekeeping troops offered by Nepal, Norway, Sweden, India and Thailand. "Even if there is a shortage of troops from the

Darfur: the world is full of it

African continent," he has said, "we are not going to accept those people."

Bashir's reasoning is that the UN resolution requires the peacekeeping group to be African in character. It does not say, however, that it needs to be exclusively African. Bashir clearly has no interest in ending the war against the Darfurians, and it seems that the rest of the world can't be bothered, either.

China holds great sway over the government of Sudan, being one of its biggest purchasers of oil. Yet China has refrained from putting any diplomatic pressure on Sudan or contributing troops to protect the men, women and children of Darfur.

Farrow informs us that Sudan has refused to give the UN mission land or water access to Darfur, or a place to base and sustain its troops. She states, "It places restraints on UN helicopter flights. It denies landing rights to transport aircraft. It refuses to allow night flights essential for civilian protection and medical evacuations."

During the Rwandan genocide, Canadian general Romeo Dallaire, who commanded the UN's peacekeeping force in Rwanda, asked for a few thousand troops to end the orchestrated, pre-planned, genocidal slaughter of Tutsis by Hutus. The request was denied. Since then, books and movies have been written and produced about the refusal of the world community to respond to his simple request. Tears have flowed and apologies have been forthcoming from major political figures.

I figure that more than $1 billion has been spent on apologizing for Rwanda. What a waste of money.

And guess what? Gen. Martin Luther Agwai, commander of the proposed UN mission to Darfur, is now begging for 24 helicopters that he says are "essential for security and protection operations."

But not a single helicopter has so far been offered by one single nation. Not one!

In 1994 in Rwanda, over a 100-day period, the world watched silently as children were slaughtered in front of their parents, as women were gang raped and subjected to unspeakable acts before being killed, and as men, if they were lucky, were hacked to death by machete wielding thugs.

Today, in January 2008, a mere 13 years after words of regret and apology started to flow from the lying pens of politicians and citizens alike, the same barbarism is occurring in Sudan.

The carnage in Darfur continues, and the world seems to be no more compassionate today than it was during the Rwandan crisis, or for that matter during our crisis, the Holocaust.

The world is full of it.

Children, little tiny creations of God, are being murdered before our very eyes, and we're watching it happen all over again. And guess what? It will happen again and again and again.

Any ideas? "Never again" doesn't seem to be working.

Israel announced the launch this week in India of a new, advanced intelligence-gathering satellite.

Israeli satellite boosts ability to spy on Iran

By YOSSEI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel launched a sophisticated new spy satellite on Monday that could boost the country's capacity to gather intelligence on Iran.

The satellite was sent into orbit from the Sriharikota Launching Range in India, using an Indian rocket.

The satellite — dubbed TECSAR and manufactured by Israel Aerospace Industries (IAI) — will use radar to identify targets, even under adverse weather conditions, including dense clouds. In this, it differs from Israel's Ofek series of spy satellites, which rely on cameras.

IAI officials said the satellite, which weighs some 300 kilograms, was launched at 5:45 a.m. Israeli time and successfully placed in orbit. IAI ground stations reported receiving signals at 7:10 a.m. showing that all systems were operating correctly.

Scientists and engineers are now conducting a battery of tests to further check the systems and gauge their performance. The first pictures from the satellite are expected within two weeks.

The TECSAR launch was postponed a number of times in the past, largely because of weather conditions.

Israel currently operates a number of reconnaissance satellites, including Ofek 5 and Ofek 7, as well as several commercial satellites such as the Amos and EROS series. A total of 11 Israeli satellites have been placed in orbit, and a number of them are still operational.

The Ofek 5 was launched in May 2002 and the Ofek 7 last July from the Palmachim missile range on Israel's coast.

Israel intends to launch another two spy satellites as part of its strategic operation commitments.

Canada takes Israel, U.S. off torture list

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Ottawa, demanding explanations.

Canada has removed Israel and the United States from a government torture watch-list after being rebuked by the Israeli and U.S. ambassadors.

A Jan. 17 CTV News report revealed that Canada's Foreign Affairs department had placed both Israel and the United States on the list as part of a training manual for diplomats visiting Canadian detainees in foreign prisons.

It also named China, Iran, Afghanistan, Egypt, Syria and others on the list, which was meant to help envoys spot signs of torture or mistreatment in these countries.

The training document placed particular emphasis on the U.S.-run Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba, where Syrian-Canadian Omar Khadr has been imprisoned since 2002 on charges of war crimes. He alleges torture at the hands of his American guards.

The report prompted swift calls from American and Israeli representatives to Canada, Alan Baker, said he was "shocked" the manual listed the Jewish state, while David Wilkins, the U.S. ambassador to Ottawa, called it "offensive" that his country was named.

Neil Hrab, communications director for Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier, initially distanced his office from the report.

Maxime Bernier

"The training manual is not a policy document and does not reflect the views or policies of this government," he told The C.N. last Friday. "We take the issue of torture very seriously. The training manual purposely raised public issues to stimulate discussion and debate in the classroom."

By the weekend, in response to the diplomatic pressure, Bernier apologized to Canadian allies listed in the document.

"I regret the embarrassment caused by the public disclosure of the manual used in the department's torture awareness training."

New CJC Director

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, has named Romy Ritter as its new regional director, replacing Mira Oreck. Ritter, who started Jan. 21, previously served as CJC's regional community relations co-ordinator for five years, when her activities included developing anti-racism programs that were implemented throughout British Columbia. More recently, she has been a consultant to B.C. human rights and anti-racism groups. Ritter has a master's in criminal justice from Boston University, focusing on hate crimes and hate groups in North America.

WORLD

Zundel Lawyer Jailed

BERLIN — The lawyer for jailed Holocaust denier and former Toronto resident Ernst Zundel was sentenced Jan. 14 to 3½ years in jail in Germany for denying the Holocaust while defending Zundel last year. Sylvia Stolz, 44, girlfriend of jailed right-wing extremist Horst Mahler, was also banned from working as a lawyer for five years. The Mannheim court said Stolz "lives in a make-believe world and wants to restore Germany's honour," and that she's a "fanatic anti-Semite." While defending Zundel, Stolz called the Shoah "the biggest lie in world history" and signed a court paper with the words "Heil Hitler." She was ejected from the trial. Zundel, 68, was later convicted of Holocaust denial, and incitement to hate and anti-Semitism. He's serving five years in jail.

Gandhi Sounds Off

WASHINGTON — The grandson of Mahatma Gandhi called Israel and Jews the "biggest players" in the world's "culture of violence." Nearly 500 people responded to the Jan. 7 blog entry by Arun Gandhi, part of the Washington Post/Newsweek "On Faith" weblog. Respondents were divided between those who called Gandhi an anti-Semite and those who added their own criticism of Jews and the Jewish state, as well as examinations of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. "Jewish identity in the past has been locked into the Holocaust experience,"

Gandhi wrote. "It is a very good example of how a community can overlay a historic experience to the point that it begins to repulse friends." He added that the Jewish future appears bleak, since Jews are a nation "that believes its survival can only be ensured by weapons and bombs." In an apology posted three days later, Gandhi stood behind his criticisms of Israel's use of violence, but said he shouldn't have implied all Jews support it.

Cemetery Desecrated

CHICAGO — Some 60 headstones at a Chicago Jewish cemetery were spray-painted with anti-Semitic graffiti. Swastikas and slogans such as "juden raus" (German for "Jews out") and "Aryan Power" were found at the Westlawn Cemetery, where 46,000 people are buried. The vandalism likely happened Jan. 6, said the local sheriff, who called it a hate crime and said several people are likely responsible.

Cancer Pioneer Dies

DENVER — Dr. Judah Folkman, a ground-breaking cancer researcher, died at the age of 74. Folkman, the son of a rabbi, collapsed and died Jan. 14 of a heart attack at Denver International Airport while changing

CJC Praises Late Priest For Dialogue Work

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) paid tribute to the late Roman Catholic priest Father Jacques Langlais, a pioneer in Catholic-Jewish relations in Quebec.

"He was a trailblazer in inter-religious dialogue and a good friend, and he will be greatly missed," said Victor Goldbloom CJC's Quebec region president.

"[Langlais'] leadership and innovation... will continue to influence the important work of so many dedicated individuals in this area," he said. "He was a tireless force in bridging different groups, communities and religions."

Langlais, who died Jan. 8 at 86, founded the Institut Interreligieux de Montréal, a centre devoted to ecumenism and intercultural relations.

Born in Rivière-Beauport, Langlais, a member of the Saint-Croix order, also founded the Institut Interreligieux in 1963, and, in 1980, he established the Quebec section of the World Conference of Religions for Peace. As well, he helped to create the Institut québécois sur la culture juive, and Dialogue St. Urbain, a dialogue group for Jewish and French Quebecers.

With the late CJC archivist David Rome, Langlais co-wrote Juifs et Québécois: 200 ans d'histoire commune (1986) and Les pierres qui parlent (1992). In 1994, he was the first recipient of CJC's Ezekiel Hart Award, given to non-Jews for furthering intercultural relations.

planes on the way to a medical conference in Vancouver. A Harvard University professor and director of the vascular biology program at Children's Hospital Boston, Folkman found a revolutionary new way of fighting cancer by cutting off the blood supply to tumours. Several successful cancer drugs are based on his approach.

Anglo Docs Wanted

JERUSALEM — A fellowship program is being launched to bring more doctors to Israel. The aliyah group Nefesh B'Nefesh, along with Israel's ministries of health and immigrant absorption, is trying to address the serious shortage of doctors projected for Israel over the next few years. The initiative targets North American- and British-trained doctors under 40. It will provide grants for the first two years in Israel totalling about $60,000. Doctors must practise at least nine months a year in Israel.

Ahenakew conviction thrown out, new trial ordered

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal has ordered a new trial for disgraced former native leader David Ahenakew, upholding a lower court decision that set aside his conviction for promoting hatred of Jews.

In a 3-0 decision, the court ruled the trial judge erred by not considering the defence contention that Ahenakew acted spontaneously and without criminal intent when he embarked on a rant against Jews in response to a reporter's questions during a conference in Saskatoon in December 2002.

"Mr. Ahenakew's comments, on any standard, were shocking, brutal and hurtful," Justice Robert Richards wrote for the court. "However, that is not the measure of the offence prescribed by section 319(2) of the Criminal Code [the anti-hate section]. It engages only in circumstances where a person 'wilfully promotes' hatred against an identifiable group. I agree with the appeal judge that, at trial, there was a failure to consider all the evidence relevant to the question of whether Mr. Ahenakew had the intent necessary for a finding of guilt."

The Crown has yet to announce whether it will proceed with a new trial, stay the charges or appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada - whose League for Human Rights was an intervenor in the case - urged the Crown to appeal.

Steve Slimovich, B'nai Brith's national legal counsel, said that "these lower decisions must be re-examined... The decisions, constitute a dangerous precedent in which the standard for conviction could be set inappropriately high.

"As the courts themselves have recognized, these hate-filled words were 'shocking, brutal and hurtful.' Further proof of motivation is simply not needed. Additional elements introduced in these decisions, such as the need to consider whether the remarks were spontaneous or not is a step in the wrong direction that the [Supreme Court] must set straight."

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said the Supreme Court must be given the opportunity "to define the issue of wilfulness... It is certainly better to refer it to the [Supreme Court] than to order a new trial."

"The public utterances of Mr. Ahenakew, an important and once-respected Canadian, had the effect of targeting and isolating the small Jewish community in Saskatchewan. After a thorough review, if the Crown believes there may be room to appeal this decision to the [Supreme Court], we certainly hope it does so," Farber stated.

Congress speaks out on human rights complaints

Please see page 20

Ahenakew, 74, the former national chief of the Assembly of First Nations (AFN), drew national headlines in December 2002 for a speech delivered at a meeting of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations.

In opening remarks to 200 to 300 delegates in which he was expected to discuss government medical services, Ahenakew related conversations he had with German civilians in 1957 while serving with the Canadian armed forces. The Germans, he said, blamed the Jews for starting World War II.

Second of two parts

Last week in this space, I brought readers' attention to the recently released executive report of the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI) Annual Assessment 2007: Social Aspects.

The Jerusalem-based, independent think tank's mission is dedicated to the well-being of the Jewish people throughout the world.

As I wrote last week, the JPPPI's annual report is a much-anticipated, multiple-use document that provides a macro-summary of the state of the Jewish world and a micro-snapshot of the many varied communities that comprise the Jewish people of the world.

Last week, we reproduced the Selected Indicators of World Jewry - 2007, the report's comprehensive table of data highlighting demographic key points of the Jews of the world.

This week, I point to some of the significant issues that the writers highlighted in the 2007 report.

There are three parts to the report: Policy Directions for World Jewry Today, Significant Recent and Current Challenges, and Societal Aspects of the Jewish People. They encompass 10 discrete chapters on a wide range of subjects.

The discussion is compelling, informative and often eye-opening. The authors neither soft-pedal the negative nor embellish the positive. They entreat their readers to apply the requisite skills, abilities and resources to the wide Jewish communal needs that they identify as pressing.

Very often, the authors disclose interesting, intriguing facts and figures of modern Jewish life that are not generally known, even by people who are very interested in Jewish communal affairs.

For example, in the chapter on socio-economic characteristics and mobility of world Jewry, the authors note that "52 per cent of world Jewry live in only five large metropolitan areas: Tel Aviv, New York, Jerusalem, Los Angeles and Haifa."

Or, on the subject of Jewish family patterns, we read: "The majority of American Jewish parents feel that the happiness of their children is more important than whether or not their children's spouse is Jewish."

In very brief fashion, I reproduce a summary of the "10 strategic agenda domains with policy directions" where the report's authors suggest action is needed.

1. Israel: The report identifies the key crisis points in relation to Israel: political/security to... confront the dangers of global radical Islamic terrorism and prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear capacities; more effective redistribution of wealth; upgraded education; and encouraging and facilitating study by haredi women and men.

2. Socio-economic issues: The authors are straightforward. Jewish education should be restructured, making it more attractive and easily available; poverty among Shoah survivors should urgently be rectified; and Jewish life should be made more accessible to a wider public.

3. Europe: A number of recommendations to help save only the "viable" Jewish communities in Europe are prescribed. The centrepiece of the suggestions concerns the availability of Jewish education. "Jewish formal education must expand. Evidence from all over the world shows that children attending Jewish day schools are more likely to develop a Jewish identity... Therefore, a significant share of funds... should be used to make Jewish education available to all Jewish children."

The authors have pointed recommendations aimed at the leaders of European Jewry, urging them to set aside "ideological, political and religious struggles."

4. The American Jewish community and the Second Lebanon War: Jewish community leaders, intellectuals and opinion leaders must deepen their understanding of Israeli security issues.

5. Migration: Belonging to a community must encompass a sense of increasing geographic mobility.

6. Jewish culture: Five specific policies are recommended "to facilitate and intensify Jewish cultural creativity."

7. Jewish family patterns: The authors recommend three watershed policies: develop new modalities of conversion making it easier to convert while meeting traditional criteria; enable children of out-married couples to gain acceptance into the mainstream of Jewish society; and encourage middle class families to have a third or a fourth child.

8. Strategic thinking: The report pleads that upgrading long-term strategic thinking about the Jewish people "is a must."

9. Deeper study of societal dimensions and problems of the Jewish people: The writers of the report lament a lack of adequate data on critical societal dimensions. Thus, they contend, "there is an urgent need to develop a research agenda and implement it."

10. Jewish people leadership development: Finally, the reports urges policies to develop Jewish people leadership because of the "urgent need to upgrade the overall quality of Jewish people leadership in Israel and the Diaspora."

The full executive report can be viewed on the JPPPI website, www.jpppi.org.il. It is illuminating and worthwhile reading for anyone who cares about the Jewish future.

Donation to Associated boosts tuition subsidies

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Inspired by Henry and Julia Koschitzky's recent commitment to provide $1 million a year for at least four years to help a dozen Jewish elementary schools that provide tuition subsidies, Toronto philanthropist Gabi Weisfeld has donated $500,000 to assist with subsidies at Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is matching the Koschitzky funds, and Weisfeld's gift will provide part of the matching grant for the portion of the Koschitzky donation that goes to Associated, based on the amount of tuition subsidies the school provides. Weisfeld's gift will be used over a three-year period retroactive to the current school year.

Toronto philanthropist gives $500,000 to school

The Koschitzky gift and federation's matching grant can be used by each school at its discretion, according to federation spokesperson Howard English. However, he noted in an e-mail to The CJN, "the intent is two-fold – to ease the financial burden borne by Jewish day schools and to assist with tuition subsidies."

Weisfeld – who was born in Germany, grew up in Palestine and fought in Israel's War of Independence – said in a phone interview that "the seeds" for her gift had been there all the time.

A retired Hebrew teacher who worked at United Synagogue Day School and Beth Tzedec Congregational School, she became involved on the board of Associated after her retirement. Her late husband, Louis, who died in 1996, was instrumental in Associated's development.

"It was always at the heart of all his philanthropy. To him, Jewish education was a very important thing," said Weisfeld, whose first husband died in 1967.

Mark Smiley, educational director of Associated, said the school has almost 570 students whose tuition is subsidized, the largest number among Toronto Jewish schools. "We are delighted by the gift," he said.

This type of funding helps "make day schools accessible," he added. Both Smiley and Weisfeld expressed the hope that all Jewish day schools in the community would have the same opportunity.

Weisfeld, who has four grandchildren in the day school system, said she hopes her gift will give more children "the opportunity to have a Jewish education, and an all-round education. Jewish education is not just learning to read and write Hebrew. It has values, and outlooks, that make you a better person, period."

Just looking at the school's budget has had an impact on her, she said. "It makes you feel... if you're blessed, you have to share your blessings.

"I hope other people will follow suit."

The dark masterpiece

The malevolence of the Palestinians who govern Gaza and the like-minded people who cheer them on, whether furtively or openly, is unique. They know that when they place Israelis within the gun sights of their weapons, they are aiming the delivery of death and increased hardship at their own people as well. Indeed, they count on the certainty of those double gun sights.

Like every other freedom-loving nation on earth, Israel will try to protect its citizens from harm and will retaliate when its enemies manage to perpetrate harm upon its citizens.

Thus, last week, was a particularly bloody week for the Palestinians in Gaza. Israel acted to retaliate for Hamas terror. It also reacted to prevent further terror. Some 30 Palestinians in Gaza, most of them gun-toting militants – but alas, five civilians too – were killed by the Israel Defence Forces.

In the week that ended last Saturday, Gazan terrorists fired some 130 Qassams and 80 mortar shells at Israeli towns and communities and at IDF forces. Last Tuesday, a 20-year-old Ecuadorian farmer was killed by a Palestinian sniper from Gaza while volunteering near Kibbutz Ein-Hashlosha.

The question begs to be asked – but it is not very often asked, one must lament, by the accusatory minds of the western correspondents – why? Why do the Palestinians continue to launch rockets and mortars at Israel? Israel has no presence in Gaza. Israel no longer rules Gaza.

The answer of course is partly because of the sense of military mission among the Palestinians who clamour for the blood of the "occupier," but it's also to evoke the Israeli retaliatory response that the planners of terror know will be rich in the lachrymose images of victimhood and "oppression." Ever the victims – in their own eyes and, it must be said, in the eyes of most of the world – Palestinian leaders have long painted and continue to paint the details of their collective, national portrait in the crimson hues of their own people's blood.

United Nations officials last weekend urged Israel to prevent the creation of a humanitarian crisis in Gaza. Hamas, typically and cynically, claimed that five people died in Gaza hospitals because of reduction in fuel supplies by Israel. But the claim was as spurious as it was false. Even with the cuts in fuel, Israel still supplied some 75 per cent of Gaza's fuel needs and Egypt an additional 5 per cent.

As the Israeli foreign ministry pointed out, "the diversion of fuel from domestic power generators to other uses is wholly a Hamas decision – apparently taken due to media and propaganda considerations. Noteworthy is the fact that while the Gaza population remains in the dark, the fuel generating power to the Hamas rocket manufacturing industry continues to flow unabated."

Israel is damned by the world when it retaliates even with non-military methods and damned by the terrorists when it does not.

But the more profoundly damned in this surreal, Catch-22 of Israel's conflict, are the people of Gaza, who, in the eyes of their own leaders, count primarily as statistical brushstrokes in the dark, manipulated masterpiece of Palestinian sorrow and suffering.

25 years ago in The CJN

The New Democratic Party was set to adopt a resolution, calling for the creation of "some kind" of Palestinian state. NDP secretary Gerald Caplan said the policy would resemble that of the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC), which said that Israel must recognize "the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people." The CLC also affirmed Israel's right to exist within secure and recognized borders, but said its withdrawal from lands taken in the Six Day War should be negotiated.

Bush's peace efforts futile

While every effort to achieve peace between the Israelis and the Palestinians must be applauded, it is difficult to envisage a peaceful solution while Hamas in Gaza steadfastly refuses to recognize the right of the State of Israel to exist and continues to allow rockets from Gaza to bombard Israeli towns. If Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas cannot provide the security that Israel requires, there can be no peaceful solution.

What good are agreements with respect to the future of Jerusalem or secure borders between Israel and the West Bank if the Gaza Strip remains a war zone that owes no allegiance to the Palestinian Authority nor is subject to any military control. If it is thought that some agreement can be reached between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, and then Israel will be left to eradicate the terrorists in Gaza, that would certainly never be accepted by the other Arab states and would provide for continuation of the isolation of Israel. Another factor that must be brought into play is the complete disarmament of Hezbollah in Lebanon, which to date the Lebanese government either has been unable or unwilling to do.

I am afraid that U.S. President George W. Bush's efforts will be just as futile as those of then-U.S. president Bill Clinton eight years ago.

Ha'aretz controversy

Andrea Levin, the executive director of the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA), attacks Ha'aretz's editor, David Landau, for remarks he is alleged to have made at a private dinner with the U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice ("Below the journalistic standard," CJN, Jan. 10). Landau has called CAMERA's version of his words to Rice a complete distortion of what he said. The only thing we can be sure of is that he did encourage the United States to actively intervene in the peace process and force Israel to make a political settlement with the Palestinians.

However, most of Levin's attack on Ha'aretz is based on the newspaper's supposedly frequent condemnation of Israel as practising "apartheid." Indeed, as a regular reader of the English edition, I can testify that the word has sometimes been used by Ha'aretz reporters and editorialists. However, Levin offers no quantitative study of the term's use in the newspaper and so we are left with only anecdotal evidence and no evidence of the context in which the term was employed.

Levin claims that Ha'aretz is engaged in the continual defamation of Israel, when it voices criticism of not only the occupation but of Israel's treatment of its own Arab and Bedouin minorities. She and others seem to believe that this somehow imperils Israel. As Zionists, we should rejoice that Israel has a free press in which the issues of the day are ardently debated.

Seeking information

I am researching the tragic but heroic life of the chief nurse of the Warsaw ghetto, Ala Golomb-Greenberg (Golab-Grynbergowa), originally from Mlaw, Poland. She introduced many innovations into the Warsaw health system and worked with orphanages and pediatric clinics. During the war, she helped save hundreds of Jewish children's lives by facilitating their escape to Polish convents and orphanages. She obstinately refused passage out of the ghetto and instead stayed with her young charges up to the bitter end. Her brother, Sam Golomb, a medical doctor, survived and came to Canada after the war, as did her daughter, Rami. Anyone with information as to how to contact survivors saved by her, or any surviving family members, please contact me.

Perspectives

Darfur deployment in disarray

By NORMAN L. EPSTEIN

Josef Stalin once said that one death is a tragedy, but a million deaths are just a statistic. The mind-numbing statistics in Darfur – more than 400,000 deaths, three million people forcibly displaced, untold numbers of women raped and wholesale destruction of 90 per cent of African villages by the government of Sudan and its Arab militias, the Janjaweed, continues to be tragically unresolved.

If this is not enough to rattle the world community, perhaps individual tragedies need to be told: Ameerah, a 15-year-old girl was gang raped and left for dead. She watched her younger brother being bayoneted to death and does not know where the rest of her family is. Or perhaps you should hear about Toma, a nine-year-old girl who barely escaped the onslaught of the Janjaweed militia and returned to the village razed to the ground and strewn with corpses. Or there is 16-year-old Mohammad, who hid in the bushes during an attack and watched his parents' throats being slit. He wants to fight for the rebels. These survivors languish either in refugee camps in Chad or in internally displaced person (IDP) camps dispersed throughout Darfur itself.

Is the international community finally moving, albeit incrementally, to an overdue intervention?

The UN Security Council passed Resolution 1769 on July 31, 2007. It calls for augmenting the ineffectual African Union Mission (AU) with UN forces to protect vulnerable civilians in IDP camps and to safeguard precarious transit lines for humanitarian aid. Humanitarian workers have been targeted for attack by both sides – 11 were murdered recently, others have been abducted, and precious assets of food and medical supplies have been confiscated.

The resolution calls for 20,000 troops and about 6,000 police in a UN-AU hybrid mission (known as UNAMID) that allows for aggressive force under a UN Chapter VII mandate to provide protection.

There is a caveat. None of the militias, particularly the Janjaweed – the Arab militia and primary perpetrators of these crimes against humanity – will be disarmed. This emasculates the mission's objective of bringing real security. Regardless, the resolution was passed unanimously by the UN Security Council, including Sudan's protector, China. The government of Sudan negotiated and then accepted the terms. Despite the resolution's approval, the Sudanese government has put up hurdles and obstacles to its deployment, which should have been in place by Dec. 31, 2007. In an Orwellian twist, the government of Sudan, the orchestrator of these crimes, sets and resets the parameters of the force.

Although the force is supposed to have mostly African troops, the resolution allows for other countries to step up if there is not enough qualified African manpower. As this is the case, Nepal and Thailand have offered experienced troops ready for deployment, but the government of Sudan has nixed their inclusion. The government has dragged its feet with respect to leasing lands for multiple bases, and it reserves the right to shut down UNAMID forces' communication networks if Sudanese forces are nearby. The Sudanese government may restrict UNAMID flights at night and invoke curfews on the international force. Someone needs to inform the government that providing peace and security to this troubled region is a 24-hour-a-day job. Does the despicable duplicity of the government of Sudan know no bounds?

Or more importantly, does the international community's acquiescence to the government's demands have a threshold below which it will not sink? It is clear the world community does not have the appetite to forcefully intervene. There is fear of taking casualties for little strategic value, or the perception of "invading" another Muslim country and the possible fallout. Even if this is somewhat understandable, the world community could invoke targeted sanctions against Sudanese leaders like President Omar El Bashir, freeze the Sudanese government's monetary assets or block the sale of some of its crude around the globe, in order to pressure the government to comply with Resolution 1769. However, the world community has not designed any specific consequences for Khartoum's intransigence. The government continues to act with impunity.

Moreover, the UNAMID mission lacks ground transport and tactical helicopters for support of ground troops and reconnaissance. This provides a convenient excuse for the government of Sudan to blame the international community for UNAMID's potential failure.

If Canada does not have these helicopters, then it must use its diplomatic leverage to lobby those countries that do to ante up.

What about China's role in aiding and abetting a genocidal regime? Of the 500,000 barrels of oil Sudan produces every day, China imports roughly two-thirds. The Chinese have invested a great deal into the oil infrastructure to secure Sudan's sweet crude, as well as at least $6 billion (US) for other commercial and capital investments. At a flip of a switch, China could end the crisis with its unequivocal influence with Khartoum. However, China is more concerned with keeping open the flow of oil and commerce with Sudan, than in stemming the flow of African blood.

China's coming-out party is the 2008 Summer Olympics in Beijing, the first major international event hosted by China since the Tiananmen Square massacre in 1989. In view of China's sordid human rights record, and particularly its resolute support for the Khartoum regime, many have called for a boycott of the Games. Certainly this must be given consideration, or at least some sort of public flogging or humiliation to change China's policy on Darfur.

Sudan has other protectors and allies. In the newly minted UN Human Rights Council, there has been no condemnation of Sudan's egregious crimes. Other countries that are notorious as human rights violators themselves defend Sudan at every turn. The majority on the council blocked the recent presentation of a UN report citing Sudan's deplorable human rights record. Meaningful resolutions by the council might have pressured the Sudanese government to bow to international pressure instead of emboldening it. In fact, the only country that has been singled out for condemnation by this "august" UN body is Israel.

Doesn't a solution exist through peace talks? Surely a sustainable peace can come about by bringing all parties to the table. But multiple rounds of peace talks have been tried to no avail, including the flawed 2006 Darfur Peace Agreement, which only one small rebel faction signed. Now, the rebel groups have fragmented into many splinter groups.

There have been attempts to bring the various groups together in order to develop a unified position. However, when the government of Sudan learns of these clandestine meetings, it sends aircraft to bomb the locations.

The Khartoum regime has procrastinated and prevaricated on numerous occasions, signing deals and then reneging on them. As soon as the ink dries, the government schemes to undermine the treaty. The Comprehensive Peace Agreement signed in 2005 between Khartoum and Africans in southern Sudan ended a brutal 50-year civil war. The wealth- and power-sharing entrenched in the peace treaty has not been honoured, and the tenuous peace is ominously close to unravelling.

Two million people, mostly African Sudanese, perished in that conflict and five million were forcibly displaced. The Khartoum regime honed its merciless tactics against southern tribes for its genocidal campaign in Darfur. The world was oblivious to African suffering then.

Are we still oblivious to African suffering in Darfur? Do the tragedies of Ameerah, Toma and Mohammad not resonate with our government leaders here in the West?

Canada is in a historic position to be the leader to end the carnage in Darfur. As a highly respected middle power unencumbered by the legacy of colonialism and the sponsor of the landmark "Responsibility to Protect" doctrine approved by the United Nations in 2005, Canada can fill the vacuum of international leadership. Twenty years ago, Canada demonstrated resolve and led the world community in facilitating the end of apartheid in South Africa.

There must be significant consequences (like targeted sanctions) for the Sudanese government's non-compliance with UN Security Council resolutions, particularly with the deployment of UNAMID.

As Canadians, we must push our government into this leadership role. More of us need to embrace the mantle of activism. Readers may join an advocacy group at castudan@sympatico.ca (author's coalition), info@sdcanada.org (Save Darfur Canada) or standwithus@stanfcanada.org (STAND Canada), each of which can walk you through initiatives to raise awareness and lobby elected officials. Call STAND Canada's 1-800-GENOCIDE for talking points to use when you place a call to our political leaders.

If we are complacent and don't engage our leaders, then we, as citizens, are just as complicit in another genocide.

As Ameerah, Toma and Mohammad fight for their lives, we have only one thing to fight – apathy!

Norman L. Epstein is co-chair of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS).

Opinions

All process,
no peace

The road to an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement has been littered with a plethora of faulty premises, broken promises and hollow pronouncements. Not by resolution, plan, framework, initiative, declaration, summit, accord, or conference – all catchwords that have been used at various times to emphasize the perceived importance of the respective proposals – has anything substantive emerged that might have brought an enduring peace any closer.

Lawrence Hart
in Hamilton

As columnist David Frum reminds us (National Post, Jan. 12), there is the old joke that the Middle East peace process is “all process, no peace.” And the odds that the perpetual stalemate will be broken post-Annapolis and in the wake of U.S. President George W. Bush’s recent visit to the region are slim indeed. There’s hardly a pundit who is predicting anything but more of the same.

Regrettably, what has emerged both before and since Annapolis is an overly forceful reaffirmation by the Palestinians that their “right of return” is inalienable and that without it, no deal with Israel is possible. The implication of this demand is no longer camouflaged, nor can it be ignored.

No less than code for the rejection of Israel as a Jewish state and the denial of Israel’s sovereignty over its own land, it looms large as the major sticking point in any current or future discourse between Israeli and Palestinian negotiators.

In paraphrasing comments attributed to Bush, a Jerusalem Post editorialist (Jan. 12) stated that Bush “has realized that it is not enough for the U.S. to leave the ‘right of return’ as a final status issue.” Instead, it “must be taken off the table now, because it stands in fundamental contradiction to the entire two-state concept.”

In essence, what we have is an American president who is hopeful that a resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute is possible by year’s end. Yet, this same president has simultaneously declared that a sine qua non of the Palestinian position is a non-starter. So what are the chances this time of peace rather than just more (futile) process?

In her letter to the editor (“Response to Hart”, CJN, Jan. 10), Rebecca Woods Baum seems to have completely missed the point of my Dec. 20 column. “Time to reclaim our campuses.” There’s no question that promoting the normalcy and many virtues of the State of Israel is laudable and should be encouraged. Nor should there be any doubt that reaching out to uninformed or undecided students is a good thing. However, if Baum truly believes that these strategies – and playing (video) games – are the be-all and end-all of campus advocacy, it’s little wonder that anti-Zionist incidents of the sort that have occurred recently at York and Ryerson universities, as well as the University of Toronto, went unchecked.

Supreme Court’s authority must be maintained

Abrouhaha has been raging within the legal community here in Israel since Prof. Daniel Freidman was appointed justice minister a year ago. From Day 1, he declared his intention to make changes in the Supreme Court and the judicial system in general.

He has since set about drafting bills and proposals in this vein, and a serious rift has ensued between him and Supreme Court president Dorit Beinisch. Politicians, lawyers, professors, journalists and former justices have joined the fracas. Some very injudicious words have been spoken. There is talk that some of these plans, if put into practice, might even bring down the government (if the Winograd Committee’s report on the mishandling of the 2006 Lebanese war doesn’t do so beforehand).

Freidman’s wrath was further piqued recently when the Supreme Court issued an injunction prohibiting the state from cutting the electrical supply to the Gaza Strip, as a proposed response to the continued Qassam missiles barrage on the town of Sderot and other parts of the western Negev. It ordered the state to re-think its decision and bring it more in line with rules of proportionality and reasonableness.

Soon afterward Freidman stated his intention to introduce rules of nonjusticiability (issues that can’t be subject to legal ruling) aimed at curtailing the Supreme Court’s authority to review government agencies’ actions when these deal with security, political and fiscal matters. In his view, these are areas that should not be within the courts’ discretion. Let’s examine the issue.

Israel’s Supreme Court has a unique role when it sits as the High Court of Justice. As noted on the Court’s website, in such cases, the “Court rules as a court of first instance, primarily in matters regarding the legality of the decisions of state authorities: government decisions, those of local authorities and other bodies and persons performing public functions under the law. It rules on matters in which it considers it necessary to grant relief in the interest of justice, and which are not within the jurisdiction of another court or tribunal.” Cases coming before the Court under this jurisdiction are often high profile, especially when top level government decisions or officials are challenged.

Taking security-related issues out of the High Court’s jurisdiction would be imprudent. I have had considerable experience for some 25 years as a legal advisor in the Israel Defence Forces, culminating in 2004-2007 when I served as the legal advisor to the IDF in Judea and Samaria. During this period, many decisions regarding West Bank issues were challenged in the High Court – between 400 and 500 in 2006 alone. Petitions dealt with a variety of topics, including means and methods of warfare, different aspects of the security barrier between the West Bank and Israel, Palestinian travel restrictions, family reunification in Israel and the West Bank, land seizures, administrative detentions, the dismantling of unauthorized Israeli outposts, the myriad issues relating to the renewed Jewish community in Hebron.

Military commanders are often exasperated by these petitions. They are sticks in the spokes of the military administration, slowing or halting its machination. They require many lawyers and long hours to prepare adequate responses. However, making these issues nonjusticiable would be unwise. These petitions keep decision makers honest, understanding that their powers are not boundless. Don’t misconstrue. It’s not that they are immoral or insensitive to the potential victims of their actions. But knowing these actions may be challenged legally, they more carefully balance between the military necessity of their plans and the impact these might have on individuals and their legitimate rights.

The military seldom loses cases brought before the Court, because most of its actions have firm legal grounds. But the Court doesn’t always rule in the military’s favour. Judges’ remarks during court proceedings sometimes lead to plans being modified or abandoned, making adverse rulings superfluous.

And there’s another important rationale. Israel’s Supreme Court has an excellent international reputation. In an era when IDF officers are unjustifiably being threatened with international indictments and cases are brought against Israel in the International Court of Justice, it is imperative for both the IDF and the state that the highest court in the land adjudicates objectively on these often sensitive matters. When the court rules in its favour, the military’s actions gain legal and moral credence from a highly respected tribunal.

Wherever Beinisch and Freidman take their other differences, Freidman must shelve his plans on this specific issue.

Overselling peace hopes, again

Sderot, and with ongoing gun battles between Hamas supporters and Fatah loyalists, implementation of any peace agreement seems entirely unrealistic.

Bush’s latest plan is also so full of internal contradictions that will take much more than 12 months to sort out. One the one hand, he has again accepted the Israeli position that the 1949 armistice lines (the pre-1967 “Green Line”) are obsolete, and that there’s a need for defensible borders. But Palestinians ignored this and seized on Bush’s demand that Israel must end the “occupation” that followed the 1967 war. (Israeli settlements are the least difficult dimension of all this – once we agree on borders, there will be no settlements.)

Bush also emphasized territorial contiguity for a Palestinian state (presumably including Gaza) while at the same time restating America’s commitment to Israel’s security. But if Palestinians from Hamas-controlled Gaza are allowed to travel to Ramallah and Bethlehem, they will start making and firing rockets into Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. When U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice forced Israel to accept an open corridor agreement a few years ago, terror quickly increased and the agreement was frozen. Wishful thinking is not enough to resolve this.

The latest peace push will be accompanied by demands that Israel dismantle or reduce its security presence in the West Bank. At every opportunity, Palestinians repeat the mantra that Israeli checkpoints, travel restrictions, military positions, security barriers, etc., are humiliating and make peace impossible. Similarly, we are told that the development of the Palestinian economy, including job creation and the creation of a “peace constituency,” also requires these changes in Israeli security policy. And such claims are repeated, usually without question, by journalists, diplomats and even by some Israeli pundits and politicians.

Here again, the gap between hope and reality is too big to ignore. Humanitarian aid shipments from the United Nations and Europe are still used to smuggle bombs. And a few years ago, when Israel removed checkpoints, reduced its security presence, and allowed the arming and training of Palestinian “police,” these goodwill measures were exploited for terror.

At the height of this violence, in 2002, when hundreds of Israelis were killed and disfigured in mass bombings, the so-called international community condemned Israeli responses in Jenin and elsewhere as “war crimes.” The Arab delegitimization campaign is continuing at the United Nations, in the media, among doubtful “human-rights” groups, on university campuses (with events such as “Israel Apartheid Week”), and elsewhere.

In these ways, the costs of failure are much too high to ignore. Instead of trying to create an idealized peace, the failure of Oslo showed that conflict management is more realistic. Small pragmatic steps that tackle one issue at a time will not salvage Bush’s legacy, but they are better than another disaster.

Yair Looftstein
in Tel Aviv

Following the Annapolis meeting and U.S. President George W. Bush’s tour, everyone is talking about peace. And real peace – meaning acceptance of Israel as a Jewish State, and an end to violence and demonization – would be a huge achievement. If Bush can accomplish this during his final year in office, we will all be grateful.

But past experience raises many questions and requires us to temper this optimism with some down-to-earth realism.

When grand peace initiatives fail, the damage is huge, and instead of moving forward, we end up moving backward, bringing even greater violence and isolation. The celebrated Oslo peace process ended with the Palestinian campaign of mass terror, in which more than 1,000 Israeli lives were lost only a few years ago. In parallel, the political war that exploited the language of human rights for demonization sought to isolate Israel through boycotts, divestment and sanctions.

The new American optimism and good intentions notwithstanding, one year is a very short period in which to resolve all of the complexities of this entrenched conflict. Internal discussions among Palestinians that might lead to compromise of the key “core issues” – including recognition of Jewish history in Jerusalem and the need to end Palestinian refugee claims – have not even started. Palestinian textbooks still don’t include maps with the word “Israel.” And with Hamas using Gaza to launch missiles at

The Kirshner File

Churchill's biographer is eminently prolific

In 1969, a year after he was named Winston Churchill's official biographer, Martin Gilbert spent a day with one of the late prime minister's friends, Edward Louis Spears, who had been a general, historian and parliamentarian. Spears, having been convinced that Gilbert would paint a realistic picture of Churchill, remarked, "Even Winston had a fault. He was too fond of Jews." Spears' nasty comment gave Gilbert pause. How, he wondered, did this "fault" manifest itself and what effect did it have on history, particularly on the Zionist movement's quest for Jewish statehood?

Gilbert, one of Britain's most eminent and prolific historians, did not get around to addressing this topic for decades, having been preoccupied with filling in the blanks of Churchill's distinguished career as a politician, prime minister and elder statesman from 1914 until his death in 1965.

Now 71, Gilbert has written six autobiographical volumes, compiled eight companion volumes of his papers and documents, and churned out an assortment of related books, from Churchill's Political Philosophy to Churchill and America. Amidst all this, he has produced general historical works such as The European Powers 1900-1945 and The Day the War Ended: May 8, 1945, as well as a steady stream of Jewish-interest volumes ranging from The Arab-Israeli Conflict: Its History in Maps to The Holocaust: The Jewish Tragedy.

He had 70 books, with sales of approximately 1.6 million, to his credit when he finally settled down to write the book that had been on his mind for 40-odd years.

Published recently, Churchill and the Jews (McClelland & Stewart) is a sweeping account of Churchill's ties with British Jews and his relationship with Zionism. As he observes in the preface: "For more than half a century Churchill's life intertwined with Jewish issues. As a young member of Parliament from 1904 to 1908 with many Jews among his constituents; as a cabinet minister in 1921 and 1922 responsible for determining the future status of the Jewish National Home in Palestine; as a war leader from 1940 to 1945 confronted by the power and tyranny of Nazi Germany; and as peacetime prime minister from 1951 to 1956, in the early days of the State of Israel..."

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

A workaholic, Gilbert is currently compiling seven more volumes of Churchill's papers and writing Are We Beasts?, which turns on Britain's bombing policies in both world wars, when Churchill was in a position to exert influence on such weighty policy decisions. He is also working on a book about Jews who left Arab lands under duress between 1947 and 1957.

A graduate of Magdalen College at Oxford University, Gilbert has always admired Churchill. As a schoolboy, he would listen to his speeches in the House of Commons, and as a fledgling historian who was mentored by a remarkable teacher named Alan Palmer, he knew full well that Churchill could never be underestimated.

Barely out of Oxford, where one of his professors was the illustrious historian A.J. P. Taylor, Gilbert was recruited by Churchill's son, Randolph, to assist him in a biography of his father. When Randolph died in 1968, the Churchill estate asked Gilbert to replace him. "They were looking for someone who was young, who wouldn't die off soon and who was familiar with Churchill," said Gilbert, who recently visited Toronto in the company of his wife, Esther, to whom he dedicates Churchill and the Jews.

When he started, he did not have the slightest notion that the project would go on and on. But he quickly realized that his participation in it would not be lucrative, having been duly informed that he would receive only a stipend rather than royalties. Forty-five years on, he has no regrets. "Every day has been so fascinating," he said.

Today, Gilbert is doubtless the foremost expert on Churchill, having plumbed every nook and cranny of his life. He has no trouble rhyming off the qualities that made him great. "He coped with adversity, denial, isolation, misrepresentation and defeat. He was tough, but not abrasive or vindictive. He didn't hold grudges or take anything tragically. He could turn implacable opponents into allies."

His greatest achievement, he believes, was in leading the British people through World War II in the face of adversity, bringing the United States on side and maintaining an alliance with the Soviet Union, an ideological foe. "I doubt whether a different prime minister could have stood up to Germany," he said, adding that a lesser leader might have capitulated and signed a peace treaty with Adolf Hitler that would have resulted in Germany's occupation of Britain, with all its unforeseen and probably terrible consequences.

As for Churchill's association with Zionism, he was largely instrumental in transforming the historic 1917 Balfour Declaration from a vague promise of support for Jewish claims to a homeland in Palestine to a more concrete expression of commitment. "Churchill's 1922 White Paper established the concept that Jews were in Palestine by right and not by sufferance," he noted. Thereafter, Palestine's Jewish population increased significantly.

To ensure that he would not grow stale, Gilbert alternated between working on the Churchill project and books on European and Jewish topics. After completing Volume 3 of Winston S. Churchill: The Challenge of War, 1914-1916, he dashed off Russian History Atlas. And after the last volume in the series, Winston S. Churchill: Never Despair, 1945-1965, rolled off the press in 1988, he wrote, among others, The Second World War, Jerusalem in the Twentieth Century and From The Ends of the Earth: The Jews in the Twentieth Century. His industriousness was recognized in 1995, when Queen Elizabeth II bestowed a knighthood on him.

An honorary fellow of Merton College,

Oxford, Gilbert ascribes his prolificacy to the fact that he was relieved of teaching and administrative duties in 1970 so that he could concentrate on his research. Yet Gilbert has not abandoned the classroom. He has taught at University College in London and still teaches at Hillsdale College in Michigan.

Two years ago, he accepted an offer from the history department at the University of Western Ontario to be a visiting professor. Although he has not given any courses, he has delivered lectures on the Holocaust and, of course, on Churchill. "The purpose of the appointment," he said, "was to generate interest in laying the groundwork for a Jewish studies program. My role there is really completed."

To Gilbert, Canada is hardly terra incognita. From the summer of 1940, when Britain was under attack by the Luftwaffe, to April of 1944, when Germany was reeling after a succession of catastrophic defeats, he lived in Toronto with a Jewish family at 546 Palmerston Blvd.

The son of a jewelry manufacturer whose Polish and Russian ancestors settled in Britain about a century ago, he was sent to Toronto as a participant in a government scheme under which one million children were dispatched to Canada and other secure countries so that they would be far from the fighting. As it happened, only 5,000 children eventually went abroad, the program having been cancelled after several ships transporting them were sunk by German submarines in the Atlantic Ocean.

Gilbert is in good form these days, despite a heart attack he suffered in September. In a concession to it, he has virtually retired from the lecture circuit, which can be stressful. But there is a silver lining: he can now allot more time to honing his skills as an author. As he quipped, "My writing may even improve."

CIC welcomes Bernier's decision

It contains a list that wrongly includes some of our closest allies," he said in a Jan. 19 statement. "I have directed that the manual be reviewed and rewritten."

The manual's existence was revealed when it was acquired by Amnesty International Canada through legal disclosure in a lawsuit against the federal government seeking to end the Canadian Forces' practice of transferring detainees to Afghan authorities.

The Canada-Israel Committee criticized the training document and the initial response by the government.

"There has never been a single substantiated case of a Canadian being subjected to torture in Israel," CIC chair Moshe Ronen told The CJN.

But the CIC was gratified to hear of Bernier's decision to review the manual.

"While the CIC remains concerned that a document such as the one in question would have included Israel as a suspect country in the first place and that such a document would not have benefited from review at more senior levels of the [ministry] or directly from the minister's office, we are pleased that the minister has reacted quickly to rectify the situation," it said in response to Bernier's comments.

On Sunday, Baker told the Canadian Press he is satisfied with the minister's response, adding that "Israel doesn't engage in torture. It's prohibited by Israeli law."

Details about who authored the training manual remain unknown, but CP reported that it has existed for the last two years since being written in the aftermath of the Maher Arar affair.

Arar, a Syrian-Canadian, says he was wrongfully deported to Syria in 2002, where he was tortured. U.S. authorities alleged he was an Al Qaeda operative, after the RCMP supplied them with erroneous intelligence. A public inquiry later backed up his claims and cleared him of any links with terror groups.

Bush-led peace process seen as a long shot

With the recent visit by U.S. President George W. Bush to Israel and Ramallah came a barrage of media coverage and commentary about the prospects for peace in the Middle East – some of it hopeful, but most of it skeptical.

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

Many commented that it is virtually impossible to meet the November 2007 Annapolis summit's call for a peace agreement to be achieved by the time Bush leaves office in January 2009. Such an agreement would have to resolve key final status issues such as borders, refugees, Jerusalem, settlements, etc.

Neither Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert nor Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is considered strong enough domestically to deliver on these crucial, highly divisive issues, especially within such a tight time frame. While final status talks officially began on Jan. 14, few Middle East experts are expecting much progress.

Prior to Bush's visit, Olmert gave a frank and wide-ranging interview to the Jerusalem Post ("Olmert: Even Israel's good friends see our future based on the '67' borders, with Jerusalem divided," by Herb Keinson and David Horowitz, Jan. 1). He admitted, for example, that because Israel expects the Palestinians to comply with the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan's first-stage demand to disarm and dismantle terrorist groups, Israel, too, must comply with the demand to stop "natural growth" of even existing settlements. Israel had not yet done this, Olmert conceded, adding: "The State of Israel will not build new settlements and will not confiscate land for this purpose, and I intend to keep the obligation."

Many journalists who focus on settlements as an "impediment to peace" should be reminded that the Camp David talks of the late 1990s did not break down over the issue of settlements. That was a resolvable issue. The talks failed due to then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's refusal to accept Israel as a Jewish state and his insistence on the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel.

Bush revisited this issue in his statement in Israel on Jan. 10, in which he said that any Israeli-Palestinian agreement "must establish Palestine as a homeland for the Palestinian people, just as Israel is a homeland for the Jewish people."

As the Jerusalem Post editorial "10 essential words" (Jan. 12) noted: "These words are critical, because they signal an end to the Arab world's double game," namely talking about accepting a two-state solution while, at the same time, insisting on a "right of return" to Israel, which means the negation of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people.

Olmert was asked in the Post interview whether he believes Abbas is prepared to accept Israel as a Jewish state and give up on the "right of return." In response, Olmert was diplomatic: "I think that Abu Mazen [Abbas] has made that choice in his heart. I can't speak for him... My impression is that he wants peace with Israel and accepts Israel as it defines itself... [although] he will not say that."

In the meantime, Abbas faces more immediate problems. As the Economist said ("America in the Middle East: George Bush drinks in the last-chance casbah," Jan. 12, reprinted in Montreal's Gazette on that date), "With the Gaza Strip and its 1.5 million inhabitants now under the control of Hamas... Mr. Abbas can speak only for the West Bank, where more Palestinians live but over which his ramshackle Palestinian Authority exercises only the feeblest control."

Abbas' inability to control even his own territory has led a majority of Israelis, according to two recent major Israeli polls, to stop supporting, for now, a withdrawal from the West Bank.

Consistently, all polls have shown over a period of several decades that Israelis are willing to give up land as part of a peace agreement. However, the massive shelling of Sderot and the arrival in Gaza of Iranian-supplied longer-range rockets (which have already hit Ashkelon and may soon be fired at other major population centres such as Kiryat Gat) are severely undermining the position of those who believe that security can be attained during the current Bush-initiated peace process.

Suicide bombers are not unstable: researchers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a comprehensive survey of Palestinian suicide bombings, three University of Toronto researchers have concluded that the bombers were not psychologically unstable and were often motivated by personal vengeance rather than by religious passions.

The study, carried out by political sociologist Robert (Bob) Brym and PhD students Bader Araj and Yael Maoz-Shai, was funded by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada to the tune of $127,000.

The results have been or will be published in several academic journals – Social Forces, Contexts, Canadian Journal of Sociology and Political Science Quarterly.

Having exhaustively studied the literature on the topic and having conducted extensive interviews with Palestinians and Israelis, the researchers reached the conclusion that the bombers were not, as previously widely believed, simply crazy.

Indeed, virtually all the bombers were stable, reported Brym.

"The organizers of suicide attacks don't want to jeopardize their missions by recruiting unreliable people. A research report prepared for the Danish government a few years ago thus noted that 'recruits who display signs of pathological behaviour are automatically weeded out for reasons of organizational security.' It may be that some psychologically unstable people want to become suicide bombers, but insurgent organizations strongly prefer their cannons fixed."

He added that the majority of bombers, like a 29-year-old Palestinian woman who killed 20 civilians in a 2003 bombing in Haifa, were motivated by a desire for revenge and retaliation. She acted to avenge the deaths of her brother and cousin at the hands of Israeli forces.

The handlers of bombers, however, tend to think in strategic and rational terms, said Brym, whose previous scholarly interest turned on Soviet Jews.

According to his data, fewer than half of suicide missions were perpetrated by individuals with "discernible religious inclinations."

In a paper, Brym observed, "In its origins and at its core, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is not religiously inspired, and suicide bombing, despite its frequent religious trappings, is fundamentally the expression of a territorial dispute."

Brym said that suicide bombing is often informed by political logic. "In many cases, it is used as a tactic of last resort undertaken by the weak to help them restore control over territory they perceive as theirs."

Brym and his colleagues were able to identify the organizational affiliation of 133 suicide bombers between September 2000 and July 2005. Sixty-four per cent were affiliated with Islamic fundamentalist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, while the rest were aligned with secular groups such as Fatah.

The Islamists were the target of 124 Israeli assassination attempts, or more than 60 per cent of the total.

Brym found that counter operations are not necessarily effective and that harsh repression may even intensify bombings and prompt bombers to devise still more lethal methods to achieve their aims.

Brym said that after Israel began to crack down ruthlessly on suicide bombings in 2002 – the high-water mark of the second Palestinian uprising – Palestinian rocket attacks against Israeli civilians escalated sharply. "In general, severe repression can work for a while, but a sufficiently determined mass opposition will always be able to design new tactics to surmount new obstacles..."

Brym said that, in 2003, Israel's then chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, recognized this problem when he acknowledged that Israeli tactics had become too repressive and were stirring up potentially uncontrollable levels of hatred and terrorism.

Yet Israeli operations have had an effect, he said. "We do know that of the nearly 600 suicide missions launched in Israel and its occupied territories between 2000 and 2005, fewer than 25 per cent succeeded in reaching their target. Israeli counterterrorist efforts thwarted three-quarters of them using violent means."

In addition, Israel pre-empted attacks with targeted assassinations of planners.

Robert (Bob) Brym

From 2000 to 2005, Israel carried out more than 200 such pinpoint strikes, killing the intended person in 80 per cent of the cases, sometimes with considerable collateral damage.

In a chronology of suicide bombings, Brym said the first attack took place in April 1993 in the Jordan Valley settlement of Meholah. It was the first of 20 such attacks in the next four years, killing 175 people.

A second and more lethal wave began with the eruption of the second intifadah in September 2000.

Altogether, from 1993 to 2005, bombers perpetrated 158 suicide attacks in Israel and the territories, killing some 800 people and injuring more than 4,600.

In an aside, he said the first-ever suicide bomber in modern Middle East history was a Japanese man, a member of the Japanese Red Army group, who blew himself up after a May 1972 terrorist attack at Ben-Gurion Airport that claimed the lives of 26 civilians, almost half of whom were Puerto Rican Catholics on a pilgrimage to Israel.

Surveying suicide attacks from a global perspective, Brym said there have been almost 1,000, with the vast majority having occurred in eight countries apart from Israel: Lebanon, Sri Lanka, Turkey, India (Kashmir), Russia (Chechnya), Afghanistan, Iraq and Pakistan.

In an interview, Brym said he and his assistants created a data base about suicide bombings during the second intifadah.

Araj, his Palestinian assistant, interviewed about 75 militant Palestinian leaders in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and also talked to 25 per cent of the families of bombers. Maoz-Shai, his Israeli Jewish assistant, interviewed 75 counterterrorism experts in Israel.

Brym said there is only one lasting solution to suicide bombings – real peace.

He argued that Israel's tit-for-tat military approach in responding to suicide bombings has been "empirically false" since it radicalizes Palestinians and exacerbates the Arab-Israeli dispute.

He advised Israel to reach an agreement with the Palestinian Authority as soon as possible. "George Bush is right," he said in a reference to the American president's call for a peace treaty by the end of 2008.

Support for Israel by evangelical Christians is not a new phenomenon, according to Paul Merkley.

Speaking last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation on Christian Zionism, the Carleton University professor emeritus of history said that Christian Zionism is "deeply embedded in the American Protestant culture, which is rooted in America's Puritan beginnings," and that it is based on the belief that the establishment of the State of Israel fulfilled a biblical prophecy.

Merkley, who taught at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem on an academic exchange in 1981, said that evangelical support for Israel was not new even when the State of Israel was established in 1948.

For half a century before that, evangelical Christians worked "hand in glove" with mainstream Zionist organizations, he added.

Since 1948, pro-Israel Christian groups have "tirelessly and effectively lobbied the Congress and the executive of the United States, have led public meetings and rallies, and their leaders break bread with political leaders on a regular basis," he said.

Merkley, an adviser on international politics to Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day, says it's not true that the "most important factor in keeping Israel secure is the Jewish vote" in the United States.

As evidence, he noted the decline of the American Jewish population to "less than two per cent" of the U.S. total.

Christian Zionists support Israel, he said, because "they sense that the people who hate Israel are the people who hate America. It's an adjunct of Conservative patriotism."

The two most important Christian Zionist organizations today are Bridges for Peace and the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem (ICEJ), both of which are based in Jerusalem and have been recognized by the Israeli government for their support of the State of Israel, Merkley said.

With activities such as an annual Feast of Tabernacles parade in Jerusalem (around the same time as Sukkot), which Merkley said is the largest tourism event in Israel, the ICEJ - of which he is a board director in Canada - has "won the goodwill of most [Israeli] citizens, and to a considerable degree has alleviated the suspicions that the Orthodox Jewish population has about the intentions of evangelical Christians."

The term "evangelical" has been "kicked around - kicked out of shape - by graduates of journalism school who never read books and who know nothing about history and nothing about theology," Merkley said.

The result is that the word "now belongs in the company of 'right wing,' 'fundamentalist,' and 'fascist,' words that - with the exception of 'fascist' - once had "an honourable meaning," he added.

About 200 years ago, "evangelical" was used to describe a Christian who underwent a "discovery" that led to a process similar to ishuvah in Judaism, he explained.

Merkley maintains that most Christians are "well disposed towards Israel," despite anti-Israel positions taken by some of their leaders.

Other misconceptions, he added, are that Christian Zionists are "missionaries disguised as friends," and that they are "premillennial dispensationalists" whose "real intention is to herd all of you so that you'll be on the spot in time for the coming of Christ on the Mount of Olives and then forced conversion."

"It's simply not true," Merkley said. Rather, the source of Christian Zionism is "Hebrew scripture," specifically Genesis.

He noted that "all the major" Christian Zionist organizations have written policies requiring members to refrain from proselytism, "and their practice conforms entirely to their policy."

Cancer victim inspires masquerade party fundraiser

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Evan Erlick was 11 years old, undergoing treatment for brain cancer at the Hospital for Sick Children, he had a dream to make the oncology ward more "kid-friendly."

Evan Erlick

At 13, in December 2006, Evan succumbed to his illness before he could see his vision come to fruition, but his dream to make young cancer patients more comfortable didn't die with him.

On Feb 21, the first annual Evan's Dream: Funky Black & White Masquerade, organized by SickKids Foundation and the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF), will take place at This Is London Nightclub, to raise money for cancer research and fulfil Evan's dream of providing other kids with cancer a better experience.

The hope is that the event, which was inspired by Evan, will raise enough money to create a room for child cancer patients to play games, and take their minds of their situation while waiting for treatment.

"My son passed away from cancer a year ago and it was his dream - when he was going through chemotherapy, he didn't like the waiting room. So the money is going to a new waiting room. It's for kids waiting to go through chemotherapy, so when they come for their treatment, it'll be more kid-friendly," said Lisa Erlick, Evan's mom and an ICRF board member who co-chaired the event.

"He wanted there to be toys, video games - I mean through an 11-year-old's perspective, he wanted it to be Disney World, but it'll be whatever it can be," she said, adding that some of the proceeds will also go toward improving a room in the bone marrow transplant unit, where parents wait.

Brad Goldhar, the president of the Toronto chapter of the ICRF, a 33-year-old non-profit organization that raises money in North America to fund cancer research by Israeli scientists, said that the event promises to be a great party.

Teen had dream to make oncology ward more 'kid-friendly'

"Lisa and Alan Erlick, who have been very involved in ICRF, have become leaders in the SickKids Foundation, and they basically wanted to do something in the memory of Evan and raise money for both SickKids and ICRF," Goldhar said.

"It'll be a cocktail party with live music, a masquerade with a black and white theme... There will be both a live and silent auction, and Michael Lansberg, [the host of TSN's Off The Record] will be the MC and auctioneer," he said, adding that he hopes the event attracts 300 to 600 people.

Guests will also be treated to live entertainment, including fire jugglers and an illusionist.

The event was inspired by Evan because even when he was suffering through surgeries, chemotherapy, long hospital stays and radiation treatments, he still thought about other kids who were going through the same ordeal.

"He would always say, 'I'm going to give them my Xbox, I'm going to give them this...'" When we were there, thank God, we were in a financial position where he could go home to an Xbox if he wanted one, and everyone was so generous with him," his mother recalled.

"Some of the other kids didn't have that... There are just too many kids that are undergoing treatment. You can't have an Xbox or a Playstation for every kid. He was just really compassionate to these kids," she said, adding that SickKids did its best to offer the kids all that it could but her son wanted to offer them more.

"He was just unique. He was very unique. He had a feisty spirit and a humongous heart. He used to challenge the doctors, and he used to get into trouble. He was just a fun, bright, feisty, compassionate, normal 11-year-old boy," she said.

"He whined, he complained, he was lazy, but he really, really was a true hero for what he had to go through. The weekly, sometimes daily trips to hospital - and the poor kid wasn't well... Some people just want him to be seen a certain way... but he was just a very sweet little boy."

Erlick said that it was a pleasure working with the people at ICRF and the SickKids Foundation because they have been very supportive to her and her family in their quest to fulfil Evan's dream.

She hopes that the event will raise awareness about what child cancer patients have to endure.

"People should just realize what these kids go through and how they really are heroes and they deserve that when they go for their treatments to at least have some sunshine - something to brighten their day."

Tickets cost $150 each and are on sale until Feb. 11. For more information visit www.sickkidsleaders.com/evan.

Rabbi honours kind-hearted, 'scary' personal trainer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Avram Rothman, the spiritual leader of the Thornhill Community Shul, accomplished more than getting fit when he joined the Pavilion Health Club.

He learned not to judge a book by the cover from an intimidating hulk of a man with an earring who could bench-press 650 pounds and had a loving and giving heart.

When that man, Julian (Jules) Reese, died unexpectedly after a bout of pneumonia at the age of 34, Rabbi Rothman determined to run the Chai Lifeline marathon in his memory. It is part of the annual ING Miami Marathon, a standard course of 42.195 kilometres (26 miles, 385 yards), which takes place in Miami, Fla., on Jan. 27.

When Rabbi Rothman turned 50, he decided that he had to lose weight and get fit. "I thought that if I don't do it now, I'll kill myself. So I made the commitment to do it right," he said.

Together with his wife, Ruth, he joined the Pavilion Health Club because "it was new, it was close, and lots of other Jews were going there."

The staff told the rabbi that he would do better with a personal trainer, to encourage him and teach him how to accomplish his goals. And that's how he met Reese.

"He was scary. His neck was as big as my thigh. He was broad and muscular, and he had a shaved head," Rabbi Rothman said. Reese, a former football player, had left the National Football League after suffering a serious injury.

But Reese was also warm and encouraging, and he had a wonderful smile, the rabbi added.

Under Reese's influence, Rabbi Rothman lost 60 pounds and began to run. He is very proud that he managed to run the Zareinu marathon.

Besides being a terrific personal trainer, however, Reese turned out to be a wonderful person as well. When he saw a group of young, obviously Jewish boys being harassed by a group of older boys, he got out of his car and came near. The older boys took off on seeing such an enormous man approaching. The younger boys also got scared and ran away.

"He felt badly that those young boys were so scared of him," Rabbi Rothman said.

When he found out that several boys from She'arim Hebrew Day School wanted to play basketball but didn't have anyone to teach them, Reese volunteered not only to coach them (at no cost) but to raise funds for uniforms and other supplies.

Rabbi Rothman and his wife are still running and maintaining a healthy lifestyle. To honour Reese's memory — a "wonderful, friendly, caring giant of a man who taught me the real meaning behind 'never judge a book by its cover,'" the rabbi said — he is organizing and fundraising for the "Run for Jules" section of the Chai Lifeline marathon.

Chai Lifeline is a not-for-profit organization dedicated to helping Canadian children suffering from serious illnesses and their family members. It offers counselling, support, and a big brother/sister program, as well as sponsoring Camp Simcha, a camp for children with cancer.

HAIR TODAY, GONE TOMORROW: Micah Sienna, a Grade 8 student at the Toronto Hesche School, recently donated his hair to Angel Hair for Kids, which provides human hair wigs for children from poor families who have lost their hair because of chemotherapy and radiation treatments, burns or other conditions. He had been growing it for three years as a bar mitzvah project and plans to grow it again in for another donation.

Donation to aid research into juvenile diabetes

Toronto couple gives $100,000

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation of Canada has received a $100,000 donation from Torontonians Irwin and Sheila Lancit.

Juvenile diabetes, now usually referred to as Type 1 diabetes, is an autoimmune disease that occurs when the pancreas doesn't produce insulin, the hormone that removes glucose from the blood and sends it to nearly all the cells in the body, enabling them to do their job.

While the disease usually begins in childhood, it sometimes hits those in their 20s or older.

Type 2 diabetes, on the other hand, sometimes called adult onset diabetes, can begin at nearly any age, and occurs when the body does produce insulin but is unable to use it properly. There is also gestational diabetes, which occurs during pregnancy.

The Lancits' first serious involvement with juvenile diabetes came after Irwin Lancit's brother, Harvey, was diagnosed with the condition when he was 23. Because he did not take proper care of himself, Sheila Lancit admitted sadly, he suffered many complications, including blindness, having both legs amputated and needing to go on dialysis due to kidney failure.

He died 15 years ago at the age of 52.

Six months before Harvey Lancit died, Sheila and Irwin's son, Matthew, then age 12, was also diagnosed with the illness. The family was terrified.

"But Matthew takes care of himself," Sheila said. At 28, he is a filmmaker, a healthy one, who exercises, watches his diet and takes his insulin.

The family was always involved with the Jewish community, Sheila said. Harvey was a former national vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, and she and her husband have been involved with the United Jewish Appeal, Mount Sinai Hospital and Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto.

When they were first approached to take an interest in Type 1 diabetes, "my first reaction was to say no," Sheila said.

But they realized that there is a real need for research — and that takes money.

The couple went to a gala fundraiser for the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation, and that's when they were inspired to announce their $100,000 donation.

The purpose of their gift, she said, is to advance research, knowledge and treatment.

"Basically, we want to prevent people from getting diabetes and the complications that arise from it."

The Lancits and Sharon Anisman of the Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation of Canada note that so far, neither party has decided exactly what project the money should be directed toward.

The organization was founded in 1974 by parents of children with the disease who were desperate to find a cure. There are now chapters all across Canada. The parent organization, Juvenile Diabetes Research Foundation International (JDRF), is the leading charitable funder and advocate for Type 1 diabetes research worldwide, according to a media release.

In 2006, the release says, JDRF provided $6.3 million for diabetes research in Canada alone. Research funded by the organization includes such therapies as restoring autoimmunity, preventing and reversing complications and achieving metabolic control.

For more information about JDRF Canada, call 905-944-8700, 1-877-287-3533, or e-mail info@jdrf.ca.

Some human rights complaints are frivolous

By RABBI REUVEN BULKA and SYLVAIN ABITBOL

In recent weeks, there has been significant media attention regarding two human rights complaints lodged against a respected Canadian magazine and a well-known media personality.

In the first case, Maclean's magazine has been taken to task for its publication of an excerpt of a book written by Mark Steyn, and in the second, Ezra Levant is the subject of a complaint for his decision two years ago to publish examples in the Western Standard of the so-called "Danish cartoons," which featured what some believe are derogatory images of Muslims and the Prophet Muhammad.

As the controversy has swirled around these matters, the attention of many columnists has focused, understandably and predictably, on the perceived limitation to our cherished value of freedom of speech. Human rights tribunals have been characterized as "kangaroo courts" and its proceedings as "Kafkaesque" or reminiscent of the medieval English court of the Star Chamber. The commission process has been condemned as a form of "lawfare" that drains the resources of the defendant while allowing the aggrieved party to proceed without penalty or cost.

Columnists have roundly condemned these two cases, characterizing them as prime examples of the willingness of human rights commissions to entertain frivolous complaints. In some cases, calls for the elimination of both the national and provincial human rights commissions have been made.

In our view, only the first of these critiques has it right, since we believe the Canadian Human Rights Commission and its provincial counterparts play too important a role to be jettisoned altogether for the sins of the British Columbia and Alberta commissions in accepting these two cases.

Freedom of expression has long been regarded as a core democratic value, if not the core democratic value, but free speech is not an absolute right, and even the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms allows for laws to override basic rights if, as Section 1 states, they can be "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society."

Through the Criminal Code, the Canadian Human Rights Act and other instruments, our legislators have declared messages promoting discrimination or hatred to be unprotected expression, balancing a diminution of individual rights against the greater collective good of social harmony and cohesion.

In the past, the Canadian and provincial human rights commissions have played an important role in protecting Canadian society, and particularly its vulnerable minorities, from the corrosive effects of hate speech. They have also historically been effective in breaking down barriers of discrimination and promoting equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

In the interest of full disclosure, we should note that Canadian Jewish Congress has made use of the Canadian Human Rights Commission on a number of occasions over the decades in order to protect the rights and security of the Jewish community when threatened by extremist racists and hatemongers. In our view, these individuals not only put our community at risk, but promoted a worldview that was antithetical to core Canadian values. In some cases, our complaints were accepted and led to a human rights tribunal or to mediation, and in other cases our complaints were denied. This is part of the process, and we accepted the outcomes.

But while we have always argued that the state has a fundamental role to play in protecting vulnerable minorities from hate speech and the harmful impact of hate, there have to be limits on the limitations.

Plainly put, it's the responsibility of the human rights commissions to assess complaints as they are tendered and to determine if those complaints fall within the ambit of the relevant human rights legislation, and then to determine if the complaints are legitimate, vexatious or frivolous. Human rights commissions must constantly recalibrate where the balance lies between free expression and its abridgement, but the determination of where to place the fulcrum must always be based on the statutory standard that such expression is "likely to expose a person or persons to hatred or contempt."

This cannot be meant to take into account speech that is merely offensive,

"politically incorrect," unpopular or critical or that hurts feelings. In a sophisticated country such as Canada, offence should not be given or taken so easily.

In our estimation, the complaints against Maclean's and Levant fall well short of the mandated standard of the provincial human rights commissions petitioned for redress and should not have been accepted. In the case of the latter, while CJC deplored Levant's decision to reprint the offending cartoons, there must be no doubt that in a free and democratic society, he has the right to be offensive.

Yes, our community knows only too well that words hurt and have been used as weapons of hate. But there must be some parameters and standards for state action to kick in. If every statement or publication that is unpopular or causes hurt feelings is actionable, then none is. And, as we have seen from the firestorm of criticism of these decisions, such abuse of legitimate human rights mechanisms vitiates their effectiveness and brings into disrepute their true value and necessity.

In the end, the appropriate application of statutory criteria is our best defence against those who would eliminate the law to protect their interests, and against those who would use the law to promote a narrow political agenda.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Sylvain Abitbol are co-presidents of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The state has a fundamental role in protecting vulnerable minorities

Romanians still deny their role in the Holocaust

By BARUCH COHEN

The International Commission on the Holocaust in Romania, which was headed by Elie Wiesel, released a report in November 2004 that unequivocally pointed to Romanian culpability in Adolf Hitler's Final Solution.

Guest Voice

It declares: "Of all the allies of Nazi Germany, Romania bears responsibility for the death of more Jews than any country other than Germany itself." —From the final report of the Commission on the Holocaust in Romania, presented to the Romanian President in Bucharest, Government of Romania, November 2004.

Yet, until today, it remains unclear whether the conclusion of the commission will in fact give rise to a new national narrative. A real change in Romania's attitude will, it seems, take generations — if in fact it ever comes.

In Realitatea Evreiasca (Nov. 6, 2007), the official publication of the Romanian Jewish Community in Bucharest, Mario Katz, president of the Agency for Combating Anti-Semitism, is quoted as saying in a report that "France and Romania, members of NATO and EU, are doing no Holocaust in Romania and that the few Jews killed were communist agents or agitators."

Denial of the Holocaust is now illegal in Romania; however, the current government has not yet taken any legal measures against deniers or anti-Semites.

In December 2005, the League for the Struggle against Anti-Romanianism published a manifesto declaring: "Israel is planning an invasion of Romania to Judaize the Romanians!" The article is signed by university professor Ion Coja. The Coja Manifesto is a pallid version of the Czarist forgery Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Coja promises "a better Holocaust without remnants. We are going to do it better."

Coja's reported trial for Holocaust-denial, dating back to 2005, has seen little progress, although the Romanian Consulate General of Montreal would not confirm this fact, on the grounds that they had no information available.

Before World War II, close to 800,000 Jews lived in Romania. They were proud of their creative and flourishing contributions to all areas of Romanian society. Today, only 8,000 or 9,000 elderly Holocaust survivors live in the country.

Baruch Cohen, a Holocaust survivor, is a member of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre and research chair of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

Baruch Cohen

nothing to combat negationism [Holocaust-denial] and anti-Semitic manifestations in their country."

There are reports that, in keeping with the Elie Wiesel Commission's recommendations, the topic of the Holocaust has been introduced into the school curriculum in Romania. However, a close examination shows not only that there are inconsistencies in the subject matter, but also that there is a tendency to omit the fact that Romanians were responsible for the brutal murder of almost 400,000 Jews. It is very disappointing that the Romanian ministry of education could not block powerful forces that are doing their utmost to slow down the Holocaust education process in their country.

There are a few encouraging signs. In several universities, including Bucharest, Iasi and Cluj, courses have been instituted that focus on teaching about the Holocaust in Romania, and Romanian President Traian Basescu has pledged to right former wrongs.

But there is a lot more to be done. As recently as the November issue of Realitatea Evreiasca, an editorial noted that anti-Semitism and Holocaust-denial are still widespread in Romania's media — journals, magazines, and television — and among journalists generally.

Lawrence Weinbaum, in his June 1, 2006, article for the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, "Romanian Society and the Holocaust," wrote: "In private conversations with the Romanian ambassadors to Israel and Ukraine respectively in 1998, this author was assured that there had been

By RABBI AVRAM ROTHMAN

Many people are debating the need for a school such as the She'arim Hebrew Day School of Toronto, for children with learning disabilities and/or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. Some think that the same service can be provided to the student while he or she remains in the mainstream Jewish day schools with the assistance of a "special needs department." Sadly, for a significant minority of students, that is a terrible error.

A number of years ago, I was privileged to be one of the creators of the special needs program in a local Jewish day school. Yet, even this particular school was unable to provide the tools needed by many of the special needs children.

My experience has shown me that Toronto's mainstream day schools could not address the enormous issue of the child's self-esteem. Time after time, we see children who are being taken out of class and given modified programs and tutors. They feel like failures as they see their friends excel and grow in areas that they cannot. Being taken out of the classroom and going to the special needs program is, regardless of how sensitive the school, an attack on the fragile psyche of a young child. The end result is that the child sees him or herself as a failure, stupid or simply unable to succeed.

In addition, the demands of today's mainstream Jewish day schools for a student to conform, be it to rise early or stay late for religious studies or prayer services, or to conform to a dress code, is beyond the ability of a special needs child, be it due to medication or the very learning issues themselves, thereby causing him or her to be criticized or disciplined by the staff, teacher or rabbi, and causing the child to be classified as rebellious.

She'arim gave my son self-esteem

These incidents lead the special needs child to have little self-esteem, feel like a failure, be wary of authority and to become the rebellious student they are treated as.

There is absolutely no way that a mainstream Jewish day school can address these students' issues. They cannot have some students constantly arriving late; not participating in some of the religious programs; and not conforming in other ways. It disrupts the school and hinders the positive growth of the other students.

Certainly, some special needs children, perhaps with medication, could be mainstreamed. But the large number of Jewish students we have today with low self-esteem, who experience constant failure and are rebelling during adolescence, is a sign that mainstreaming does not work for many of our children.

I believe when possible, each school should address the need within its own walls. But we must understand that many students cannot be mainstreamed and that She'arim is not a luxury but a necessity.

When working to develop my school's special needs program, I had no idea that I would have a child that would need to use such a program. Even more so, I had no idea that the program and the school would prove unable to address the needs of my child.

I want my children to grow up in an atmosphere of Torah, with a love of Judaism and learning from wonderful, caring rabbis. However, more so, I want my child to remain a good Jew, to feel good about himself, to believe that he can succeed. He needs to know that he is a good boy, that HaShem loves him and that he is not a loser or stupid.

Mainstream Jewish day schools try very hard to give our children the knowledge and lifestyle that we want for them. They also try to make them feel good about themselves and to be caring Jews. But while it is not the fault of the day schools, some students need to be in a school such as She'arim, a school specifically designed for them and one that has shown time and again to work.

She'arim could not provide the specific religious atmosphere I wanted for my child – it is a community school – but it gave him much. It gave him the self-esteem, the knowledge that he can succeed, the feeling that he is not second rate and the tools to take the next step in his education successfully.

Even though my child has completed the She'arim program, I certainly hope and pray that our community will do everything in its power to support it and all of our children whose future depends on it. For the sake of the children who need this school – those who do not have a choice – don't take away the lifesaver that has proven to work, for we are talking about their future, and frankly, our future depends on it.

The policies and practices implemented by the Israeli regime on the people and land of Palestine are strikingly similar to those implemented by the South African apartheid regime and are in direct violation of the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid. Israeli apartheid is rooted in the state's creation in 1948, when more than two-thirds of the indigenous Palestinian population were ethnically cleansed from their homes and lands to create the Jewish majority needed to establish the Jewish state. Since 1948, the Israeli state has implemented forcible transfer of populations, land expropriation, labour exploitation, ghettoization, humiliation and murder of indigenous Palestinians to maintain Israeli domination over Palestinians.

This crackling bit of prose – courtesy of the folks who are about to bring us Israeli Apartheid Week 2008 (after successful stints in 2005, 2006 and 2007) – is an odd combination of inflammatory and yet turgid, racist and yet mundane, tragic and yet

Debunking the apartheid myth comic in its mendacity and utter pomposity. But it's also real. These people are coming to a campus near you in a few weeks (Feb. 3 to 10) to inform us that Israelis are occupiers and the Palestinians are their victims.

Never mind all those charming young men and women with Semtex and 10 pounds of nails strapped to their chests who are obliterating all of those wicked Israeli colonialists on their way home from Grade 3. A mere side point. For as we know from our friends on the left, there are no civilian targets, anyway. In between soccer results and bites of falafel, Israelis plan strategies of colonization, and suicide bombings are just the tactics of liberation.

So here's another definition of the "postmodern": any piece of delusional fantasy that gets an airing as serious discourse. Apartheid week is the postmodern in all of its perverse glory. One can, I suppose, close one's ears until all of the shouting stops, but I think there's a better way, and that's to get informed on the utter deception that is being perpetrated here by people who yell apartheid and scream about freedom – usually within the cushy confines of some Western university – and then want to boycott Israeli academics.

Prof. Menachem Kellner, an internationally respected scholar of Jewish thought and head of the Jewish studies department at the University of Haifa, has spent much time and energy writing and lecturing on the lies that form the basis of the attempted boycott of Israel for being an "apartheid" state. In his words, a "pastiche of distortions" are used to generate support for the ultimate aim of Israel's destruction.

Some months ago, I invited Kellner to speak about these issues in Toronto. As coincidence or providence would have it, his visit to Toronto coincides with the shenanigans of Apartheid Week. I urge every single person who is interested in being informed about what is happening on campus and about the assault that Jewish students are increasingly facing, to attend Prof. Kellner's lecture, sponsored by Torah in Motion, in Toronto at Yeshiva Or Chaim on Thursday, Feb. 7 at 8 p.m.

Jewish Life

Exit Ghost by Philip Roth, Viking Canada.

Every new book by Philip Roth becomes a publishing event – eagerly awaited and fiercely discussed. Approaching 75, he is the recipient of a bevy of literary awards and the only living American writer whose complete works (28 volumes) are being published by the Library of America.

Exit Ghost (the title is a stage direction in Macbeth) is Roth's ninth novel featuring his putative alter ego, Nathan Zuckerman, who first appeared in The Ghost Writer (1979). Although the protean Zuckerman is close to Roth in biographical detail, their lives and actions are hardly congruent.

Exit Ghost is neither as ambitious nor as successful as that trio of earlier Zuckerman novels: American Pastoral; I Married a Communist; and The Human Stain. Also, it lacks the compassion and emotional intensity of Patrimony (1991), the compelling story of the life and death of the author's father.

Zuckerman, now 71, is the sad victim of prostate cancer that has rendered him both impotent and incontinent. For 11 years he has lived reclusively atop a New England mountain. His energy and vitality are things of the past.

Roth cruelly writes that "the once rigid instrument of procreation was now like the end of a pipe you see sticking out of a field somewhere, a meaningless piece of pipe that spurts and gushes intermittently, spitting forth water to no end, until a day arrives when somebody remembers to give the valve an extra turn that shuts the damn sluice down."

Roth says goodbye to Zuckerman

Forsaking his rural retreat for a visit to Manhattan to consult his urologist, Zuckerman is bewildered by the ubiquity of the cellphone. "Everywhere I walked, somebody was approaching me talking on a phone and someone was behind me talking on a phone. When I took a taxi, the cabbie was on the phone. For one who frequently went without talking to anyone for days at a time, I had to wonder what that had previously held them up had collapsed in people to make incessant talking into a telephone preferable to walking about under no one's surveillance, momentarily solitary, assimilating the street through one's animal senses and thinking the myriad thoughts that the activities of a city inspire. For me it made the streets appear comic and the people ridiculous."

In the big city, Zuckerman has three unexpected encounters that lend tension and interest to his return, however briefly, to modern society.

The first of these is a figure out of his past, Amy Bellett, once the lover and inspiration of the famous writer I.E. Lonoff, Zuckerman's friend and mentor. She is now poor and sickly, and her beauty and wit have faded ravaged by time and circumstance. She possesses an unfinished manuscript by Lonoff that may contain a scandalous secret.

The second of Zuckerman's encounters is with 28-year-old Richard Kliman, a relentless and predatory writer who is eager to glean information from Amy and Zuckerman about the life of Lonoff whose biography he is writing. Both of them, dismayed by Kliman's insensitivity, turn aside his frantic importunities despite his anger and frustration.

In the end, Kliman's "exasperation reached its crescendo, but rather than hurling the manuscript at my head – as I fully expected, instinctively raising my arms to protect my face – he dropped it onto the pavement, onto the New York sidewalk, only inches in front of my feet, and fled into traffic, darting between the streaming cars that I could only hope to see shatter the rampaging would-be biographer to bits."

The third and most significant of the encounters is with a "beautiful, privileged, intelligent, self-possessed, languid-looking 30-year-old." She is happily married, and Zuckerman's infatuation with her is a meaningless fantasy beyond realization.

Interspersed throughout the novel is an imaginary dialogue, a playlet with the characters He and She. The words are written by Zuckerman on his hotel stationery, the erotic ramblings of an old man for the unobtainable.

Rich with provocative ideas and Roth's distinctive literary style, Exit Ghost is a sympathetic farewell to Zuckerman. He had been around a long time, the subject of nine of Roth's novels. It was time for him to go.

Jewish birthdays, Part 2

Happy Birthday! If you are celebrating your birthday today, you are sharing this special day with about 36,000 Jews around the world.

The number of Jewish birthday boys and girls will vary depending on which calendar you are using and the accuracy of the recently released estimate of 13.2 million Jews by the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute. [tinyurl.com/333wdd]

Anyway, back to you. You can't celebrate your Jewish birthday if you don't know when it is. If you've lost track or were never sure of the date, no problem. It's easy to figure out. Just go to the Jewish Birthday Calculator, type in the English date and indicate whether you born in the morning or in the evening or night. Click the button to find out the Jewish date to find out when it next occurs. You can even set it up to e-mail you an annual reminder prior to your Jewish birthday. [tinyurl.com/2vjw2d]

How can you celebrate the day in a Jewish manner? In the article "Birthdays, Jewishly," Sandra Widener and Lisa Farber Miller have several suggestions for kids, but I think adults could enjoy some of these, too.

- Plan a special family-only Shabbat dinner dedicated to the person celebrating a birthday.
- Or start a Saturday slumber party with a havdalah ceremony.
- Do a mitzvah together. Birthdays are a good time to convey the importance of mitzvot such as bringing a piece of birthday cake to an ailing relative or friend.

- Plant a tree. An ancient and lovely tradition is to plant a tree when a new baby is born. According to the Talmud, in biblical times, a cedar was planted for a son and a cypress for a daughter. [tinyurl.com/pw8or]

Although the song Happy Birthday To You is a staple of most birthdays, you can inject some Hebrew into your next celebration. There are several kids' tunes ranging from Hayom Yom Huledet [tinyurl.com/2aoxcj] along with a surprising number of other melodies. [tinyurl.com/25jp97]

And for a decidedly more mature audience, there is Moshe Vilensky's Tefilat Yom Huledet, A Birthday Prayer. Vilensky (1910-1997) immigrated to Israel from Poland in 1932 and was awarded the Israel Prize in 1983 for his work in Hebrew music. [tinyurl.com/2sblep] Yom Huledet is moving and melancholy. Even if you don't understand the lyrics, you'll be entranced by Chava Alberstein's incredible performance. [tinyurl.com/2wfb43]

For something more upbeat, here's one more Hebrew birthday tune for you. I have written before about the Eurovision Song Contest, which Israel has won on three occasions. [tinyurl.com/33vo8u] Eurovision entries try to be crowd pleasers, and in 1999, Israel's submission was the breezy Hebrew and English tune Happy Birthday sung by the quartet Eden. "Happy Birthday to you, chalomot yitgashmu... Bekef, besimcha uve'osher" (dreams will come true... with fun, with happiness and joy). [tinyurl.com/3ck6bf] Happy Birthday placed a respectable fifth in a field of 23.

As I mentioned last week, part of the reason for this column is that Israel is about to celebrate its 60th birthday. You can take a peek at some of the special events being planned at the Israel@60 site. [60israel.org/]

When Israel hits 60 in May/lyar, it will still be a youngster compared to the fabled age of 120. In that vein, I'll leave the last word to Rabbi Lewis Eron, director of religious services at Jewish Geriatric Home in Cherry Hill, New Jersey. [tinyurl.com/322sdj] One Shabbat morning, the rabbi announced that a well-loved resident of the home was about to celebrate a milestone birthday and he wished that she live to the age of 120. At that moment, a friend of hers raised her voice and corrected him. The friend said firmly, "No, rabbi, you should wish her 120 years and three months."

"Why the extra three months?" the rabbi replied.

"Rabbi," she declared, "why should she spoil her last birthday? Don't you want her to enjoy her party?"

We will all experience 'infinite goodness': Kabbalist

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When Madonna and Briney Spears began wearing red string bracelets on their left wrists to ward off the evil eye, Kabbalah took a hit in the mainstream world, and some devoted followers of the Jewish mystical teachings were upset that celebrities were trivializing it.

But when a group of Canadian students and young professionals travelled to Israel on a subsidized tour organized by Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) – a new centre in Thornhill that offers Jews a place to “hang out, be inspired and JUMP in” – they met with a Kabbalist who was intent on showing them how “awesomely awesome” the Kabbalah is.

Avraham Loewenthal, who is originally from Detroit, made aliyah in 1994 and currently lives in a flat below his Gallery of Mystical Art in Safed, a northern Israeli city known as the centre of Jewish mysticism.

Before Loewenthal made the move to Israel, he began studying meditation while studying psychology and painting in university.

“Someone in college told me about this book Jewish Meditation. I read this book in college and it changed my life. I started reading it, and I was just like, ‘Wow, there’s this kind of stuff in Judaism!’”

He said the book, written by Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan, was so dense that it took him about six months to get through it, but it floored him.

“I was like, ‘This is the most amazing thing I’ve ever read in my life... To make a long story very short, there was another book on the Kabbalah by Aryeh Kaplan, and I read another book by Aryeh Kaplan, and then I moved to Tzfat [the Hebrew name for Safed].”

Although Rabbi Kaplan was soft-spoken, even skeptics wouldn’t be able to resist his charisma, passion and infectious positivity, Loewenthal said.

“The reason we were created is for every single one of us to experience the greatest possible goodness that could ever possibly be,” Loewenthal added. “It says in the Kabbalah that the only reason we were created was for every single one of us to bliss out so big that we can’t even imagine what we are talking about. It’s a really awesome idea.”

But reality is getting in the way, he said.

“There isn’t one person in the world who is experiencing infinite goodness. There is a lot of suffering. Right now in the world, every single day, there are 24,000 people dying of starvation. Every single day, after day, after day, year after year, and that’s just one thing happening in the world.”

During his brief lecture about the basic subject matter of the Kabbalah, Loewenthal explained that the texts deal with life’s biggest questions: What is the meaning of life? What is our soul? What is God? Why are we here?

He said that according to the Kabbalah, the process of creation has three stages and that everything we go through in life is part of the process of spiritual transformation.

“Every single one of us has a body and a soul. Our bodies are here in the world for so many years and then they’re gone. The Kabbalah is trying to get us to realize that the part of us that is really us is something that is here forever, is something that so awesomely awesome, you can’t even imagine how awesome it is.”

He said that another concept is that everyone’s soul is part of one universal soul and we all go through experiences together.

“When all the spiritual transformations are complete, all the infinite goodness is finally going to become real to everybody in a place of eternity.”

Loewenthal added that Kabbalists believe that the purpose of creation was to give infinite goodness to everybody – and God doesn’t fail in his plans.

“So we know that there is a 100 per cent guarantee that every single one of us, every single one in the world, no matter what we do, every single model of creation, will come to experience all infinite goodness.”

He said that miracles are happening before our eyes, but people are so caught up in their daily lives, they don’t realize they’re happening.

“If we can think of the bigger perspective for one second and go back 2,000 years, we were all living in the land of Israel. We were a holy, holy spiritual nation. Two thousand years ago, we were kicked out of the land of Israel, we spread throughout the whole world, but we left with an ancient tradition so that way into the future, we could gather from all over the world and come back to the land of Israel,” he said.

“Where were we 65 years ago? In the Holocaust. In the past 65 years, in front of our eyes, Russia falls. And the Jews come back. South Africa falls, and the Jews come back... It is a miracle. Nothing like that has ever happened in history. It’s happening so fast, we don’t even realize that it’s happening. It’s such a trip.”

Canadians reminded of human cost of war

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Living in Canada, learning about Israel primarily through the media, we can easily forget that it's a place where life goes on despite the constant threat.

On the other hand, during a 10-day tour of Israel packed with sightseeing, adventure and fun, it's easy to forget about the human cost of a seemingly everlasting conflict.

But when a group of Canadian students and young professionals travelled to Israel late last month on a subsidized trip organized by a new social networking group called Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP), the trip staff wanted the participants to experience Israel on all levels.

The group travelled to Misgav Am, a kibbutz in the Upper Galilee that sits on a hilltop metres from the Lebanese border. There, at a lookout point where they watched clouds roll over Lebanese villages below, they met Arieh Ben-Yakov, a hardened, politically incorrect, 67-year-old kibbutznik who moved to Israel in 1961 from the United States.

Having served Israel on the battlefield and in the agricultural field, Ben-Yakov felt he was entitled to what he called his harsh, crass worldview.

"I have very strong opinions about lots of things, and you need to realize the fact that I've been a committed warrior for a long time. You don't keep doing this without it having an effect on the way you look at the world and the way you see things," he said.

Ben-Yakov spoke about "Arab propaganda" that perpetuates lies about the Jewish state.

"Contrary to Arab propaganda, we didn't steal their country, we didn't kick them out of their homes, we didn't rob them of anything. They sold us shit and we turned it into gold. This country, the beauty of it and the development of it, we did it. Nobody else. And we've been doing it since the 1890s," Ben-Yakov said.

"When Zionism started in 1890, we got permission from the Turkish authorities to purchase land for Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael. And the Turks thought that was a super good idea. The Arab landowners did not sell us good land. They sold us marshes and swamps and the mountain tops and all the places where nothing grows. And they thought they were doing a good job taking money for nothing."

He said that after Israel's War of Independence and the Six Day War in 1967, many who didn't want to live under Israeli rule, fled to neighbouring Arab countries.

"They attacked us and they lost and then they ran like hell, and the rest who stayed bitch and moan about their rights when they lose. If they had won, there wouldn't be a Jew left here..."

"Understand, we did not come here to be crusaders. We just came to set up a home... In '48 we didn't even have an army and they attacked us from five different countries... They've been attacking us ever since and putting the blame on us."

He said that during the Second Lebanon War, his kibbutz, which grows apples and cherries but also shares its property with the army, was bombed from the first to the last day of the war.

"Unfortunately, more than 10 rockets landed inside... we spent most of our time firefighting."

When it comes to achieving peace in the Middle East, Ben-Yakov said there is a very simple solution.

"Stop trying to kill me. Stop trying to kill me and you'll have peace the same day. I'm not looking for trouble, I want to raise my children. But I've learned how to deal with trouble."

Ronen Malik, JUMP's Israeli tour guide who shared his story about his terrifying experience as a reserve soldier during the Second Lebanon War, is seen here educating the participants about Israel's ancient history.

[Ori Gilad photo]

Behind the tough exteriors of hawkish Israelis like Ben-Yakov, there are daughters, sons, wives and husbands who want nothing more than to live with their families in peace, and fear the consequences and losses of yet another war.

The JUMP participants were reminded of this fact when Ronen Malik, their 30-year-old Israeli tour guide, told his horrifying account of fighting in the Second Lebanon War as a reserve Israel Defence Forces soldier, and shared his fear of not being there for his wife and young daughter.

Ten days after two IDF soldiers were kidnapped from an area near the Israeli-Lebanese border, Malik got a call from his commander to join his unit.

He met with his unit on Friday, and before Shabbat, Malik, who is modern Orthodox, called his wife to wish her a Shabbat Shalom.

A few hours later, his unit arrived at Misgav Am before they set off on a seven-hour trek into Lebanese territory.

He said they travelled on foot toward a village near Tayba, where his unit was to relieve a group of young soldiers who had been on duty for 48 hours, and that after the next 48 hours, his unit would be relieved by another unit. But when the time came for them to be relieved, his commander informed them that no one was coming to replace them, and they would be continuing deeper into Lebanon.

When they arrived in Tayba, they saw a UN vehicle.

"We asked our commander if we could stop the car to check if they were enemies or not. We didn't get permission to stop it because the permission comes from politicians. The moment this car left – and they saw us – right after, there was rain of grenades and rockets over my unit."

After escaping unhurt from this attack, they entered another village, and that night, they found a large home to eat and sleep in.

"It was three floors. On the first floor, there was a very big kitchen. No one was allowed to be in there because there was a big window that faced the Litani River... But one of the main problems that we had in the last war was they didn't open logistic routes... for vehicles and tanks to bring in food. After 48 hours, we didn't have any food."

Malik said they had to prepare their own food, so he and two other soldiers in his unit volunteered to bake pita bread and make rice.

Baking the pita created a lot of smoke, so to avoid getting all the smoke in the kitchen, they found a small room adjacent to the kitchen.

Because they were running back and forth between the kitchen and the small room, they decided to take the door off the hinges to make it easier for them. After they ate dinner, they tried to get the door back on the hinges, but they couldn't do it.

"To this day, I don't know why. It was so simple. It was just two pins. So we just put the door leaning [against the wall]."

Malik said that minutes later, the door slid down and made a loud bang. A second after, terrorists from Hezbollah began shooting into the kitchen where he and his two friends were.

"My friend screamed, 'Mechabel!' Terrorist! And we started to shoot back."

One of his two friends got injured, but all survived the attack. After an investigation into the incident, they determined that the loud noise made by the door gave them warning about the attack.

"Thanks to the fact that we didn't succeed to put the door in place when it fell down, the terrorists thought that we were shooting at them. They had been two metres behind the kitchen waiting for a good moment, and they shot without looking. If that door hadn't fallen down and surprised them... I don't want to think about what could have happened."

Malik also shared a story about a soldier from another unit that moved him to tears.

"Not far from where I was, there was another soldier from the reserve, and [his unit] entered more or less the same kind of house."

During a gun battle between the IDF and Hezbollah, a grenade was thrown into the house.

"Roey Klein, this was his name, saw the grenade. He was married with two kids. He decided to jump on the grenade to save all the soldiers around him. In the moment that he jumped on the grenade, he screamed, Shema Yisrael HaShem Elokeinu HaShem Echad..."

"The last day of the war I remember that I had a dream. My daughter was four months old, she wasn't speaking yet and I had a dream that she's screaming, 'Father, where are you?'" he said, fighting back tears.

He recalled crossing back into Israel at 4 a.m. Having had no contact with his family for the 11 days that he spent in Lebanon, he couldn't wait to hear his wife's voice.

"I called my wife, and I start to cry like a baby."

Scholarship recognizes student's leadership

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

He's got the kind of resume that might give other students his age anxiety attacks at the mere thought of living up to his standards.

Michael "Mookie" Kideckel, 18 and a recent Thornhill Secondary School graduate, accomplished more in his four years as a high school student than most do in their entire academic careers.

But Kideckel doesn't look as if he'll be slowing down any time soon, and certainly doesn't seem like the type who will peak in high school.

The University of Toronto freshman is the latest recipient of the Dennis Waldman Foundation for Jewish Education award, in recognition of his outstanding accomplishments.

The foundation was established after Dennis Waldman, a former Hebrew school teacher, died suddenly in 1989, at the age of 41.

His family and friends established a trust in his honour to contribute to the education of Jewish youths in the community.

Every year, the non-profit organization awards a $2,500 scholarship to a student who has completed high school and intends to continue on to post-secondary education.

As a high school student, Kideckel was involved in extracurricular activities from the start.

In Grade 9, he was part of the school's technical crew that offered their skills for school assemblies. He later became the co-founder of Battle of the Bands and helped raise money for the York Region Food Network and for War Child, an organization that helps raise awareness about children affected by war. In grades 11 and 12, he served as a mentor for incoming freshmen.

Kideckel also helped found a new chapter of STAND (Students Taking Action Now Darfur), a social action group dedicated to raising awareness about and ending the crisis in Sudan.

"I'm not sure how I first heard about the Darfur crisis, but around 2005, I started to become more interested and concerned about this alleged genocide that nobody seemed to be doing anything about," Kideckel said.

He said that when a group of students approached him and a friend, Brittany Dale, about starting a high school chapter, they got to work.

"Since all but Brittany and I were graduating that year, it was really up to us to get it off the ground... We connected with [STAND] and became the first high school chapter in Canada, running T-shirt sales, letter-writing campaigns, and hosting a Darfur conference attended by delegates from schools all over York Region."

But most important was his role as a young Jewish community leader. Kideckel is an executive member of the Temple Kol Ami youth group and was also elected as the 2007-08 national North American Federation of Temple Youth (NFTY) vice-president responsible for social action.

"We just spent time raising money for and spreading education on the need for mosquito nets to combat malaria in Africa. Right now, I'm working on a new initiative, based on the idea that as a youth movement, we should be working for youth rights issues," he said.

Kideckel said he is thankful to his mother, who pushed him to become involved in the Jewish community.

"Working with Jewish youth has been a major part of my life because I found that NFTY brought together people with a strong, positive outlook on social action and a lack of apathy," he said.

"The Jewish tradition has so much to teach about the values of tikkun olam [repairing the world] and justice, and it applies to the most contemporary issues. The teachings of Torah and rabbinic commentaries have some of the oldest and strongest statements on environmental protection, the importance of welcoming the stranger, not to mention worker rights and other issues."

Not only did Kideckel leave an impression on the board of directors for the Dennis Waldman Scholarship, but his teachers were also impressed by his accomplishments and character.

"Mookie is a prodigious and ambitious young man, dedicated not only to academic excellence, but also to working for the betterment of society... I believe Mookie's genuine personality is at the heart of his outstanding qualities as a leader. He leads by earning respect and is able to build consensus by listening to and expressing genuine appreciation for the ideas of others," wrote Ian Beswick, Kideckel's business studies teacher, in a letter of recommendation.

"The main reason I do what I do is that I've found it fun and fulfilling. I love working with people and get a thrill from leadership," Kideckel said, adding that being awarded for doing what he loves is an honour.

"I know there were a lot of other qualified applicants, and the recognition and prestige of this award mean so much."

Kideckel, who is hoping to get into the peace and conflict studies program at U of T, which doesn't start until the second year, said he is still uncertain about what career path he'll choose, but working with people is a priority.

"So far, my options seem like law, probably working for an NGO or some sort of international forum, teaching, or some sort of informal youth work. Maybe even a rabbi. Who knows?"

רכבים לעצמאות

סרטי חוב

אוי, איך שאני אוהב את חודשי החורף שבהם מוציאות חברות הסרטים את המיטב שבמיטב לפני תחילת האביב. אני מנסה לסנן עבורכם הרבה ובל כדי להמליץ על סרטים שאני די בטוח שגורמו לכם הנאה.

The Kite Runner

קרוב לרואי שכבר קראתם את הספר המופלא הזה, סיפורם של שני ילדים אפגנים בתקופה סוערת של מלחמות, שלטון רוסי, שלטון טאליבן, וחיים באר"ב. זהו ללא ספק אחד הספרים היחידים שלמים שיצאו לאור בשנים האחרונות. בעיני גדולה היא בהעברת ספר מוצלח לסרט על המסך הגדול הפעם, לטעמי האישי, עלה התסריט יפה ביותר. הסרט נאמן מאוד למקור. וגם אם קראתם את הספר, שווה לראות את הסרט ולו בגלל התמונות המופלאות של הפרחת העופיות-לראות את העיד קאבל מנסה בעיפיותם, והמחלמות האגרסיביות להורדת העופיות.

לפני שנה וחצי הייתי בכיכר טיאנמן בבייג'ינג, ונדחמתי לראות מאות עופיות סגוניים מכסים את השמיים, ולא רק ילדים הפריחו אותם. וחשבתי לעצמי שלא מפלא שבמדינת סוגרות ומדאונג-קו השמיים שייכים לאזרחים, והעופיות אינן ידע גבולות ונעות להם הרגשה של חופש. תשע בסולם קורן.

Junio

נערה בת חמש עשרה נכנסת להריון מיוחסים תמימים עם בן כינתה הגמלני. לכאורה-באלאן שאפשר להפוך אותו לסרגלני ולסרט שחור משחור. אבל לא ג'ונז! זהו סרט רגיש, מלא חוש הומור וסיטואציות צובטות לב על החיים בשנת אלפים ושבע. הילדה ג'ונז מקפדת משפחה חמה וגם חברה לכיתה תומכים בה. לא אגלה לכם את הסוף, כדי לא לפגוע בהנאה שלכם, אבל זה סרט שעושה ממש כין. תשע בסולם קורן.

בוש

האם ישפיע בוא של בוש למורח התיכון על קצב תהליך השלום? קשה לדעת. עד כה נכשלו רוב הנבואות בתחום. למען האמת-פריצת הדרך הגדולת-ביקורו של סאדאת, החסכם עם עראפת-באז בעיקר בגלל אומץ לבם של מנהיגי המורח התיכון, ולא של גורמים חיצוניים. שנים מהם, סאדאת ורביק, שלמו על אומץ לבם בחייהם אחרי שוב בפרס נובל לשלום. אי אפשר להתעלם מתרומתו של בל קלינטון, אבל קשה להאמין שבא, בשנות השמינית והאחרונה יצילו לגשר על המרחק העצום שבין המחנות, ובעיקר במציאות של חמאס שולט ביהודה. אבל מי אמר שלא ניתן צאצא, קטן ככל שיהיה. אבל שישאר ביעור.

A Personal Message from Lou Myles

Dear Friends:

After 50 years of suiting YOU, the most wonderful people in the world, I am going to semi-retire. I am closing my retail store in Woodbridge and will be moving to new premises in downtown Toronto.

In preparation for this exciting move, I am clearing my Woodbridge store of all inventory. I have on hand a limited amount of ready-to-wear suits and sport jackets, as well as approximately 100 suiting and jacket lengths — fabrics ready to be custom made for you!

Thank you for all the fabulous years, and I look forward to seeing you very soon!

Sincerely,

Lou Myles

Upper Canada Day Camp

At Upper Canada Day Camp, field trips are our specialty. Twice per week we jump on a bus and take in all that the GTA has to offer. We travel to exciting places like African Lion Safari, Ontario Place, the Toronto Zoo, Wild Water Kingdom and The Science Centre. Whether we are enjoying a theme park, sporting event, or nature trail, the objectives are the same: to explore, discover and have fun among friends. Days when we are not on trips are equally busy. Activities such as swimming, sports, arts, crafts and science keep bodies and minds active and entertained. Canoeing, archery and rock climbing at our Kettleby Valley Camp location, round out our dynamic program. Friendship, safety and most of all fun are what our camp is all about.

Our camps run from Monday to Friday 7:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. for children ages 6 to 12 years. We offer family discounts and provide a nutritious morning and afternoon snack.

TIMBERLANE KEEPS A TRADITION ALIVE

For decades, kids in Canada and the States have gone camping in the summer. We remember our camping days fondly, and want to pass the experience on to the next generation.

Founded in 1958 by Barry and Philomena Lowes, Camp Timberlane has strong roots in this camping tradition. "Spirit Integrity Tradition" is their motto.

Camp Timberlane is just south of Algonquin Park, with its own lake, Lake of Two Islands. The camp is beginning its second 50 years, now under director-owner Corey Mandell, of Mandell Entertainment. Barry and Philomena's son Brit Lowes is a director.

Mandell himself was a camper, then a staff member and program director. He has been involved in Timberlane for 28 years.

"Timberlane's staff," Lowes observes, "have a strong sense of community and commitment. Ten to 15 years on staff is not unusual. Many of our people see the camp as a 'home away from home'. It's a cliché, but sometimes they're true."

Seventy-five to 80 per cent of paid and volunteer staff, says Lowes, are former campers. And many alumni return as volunteers to share skills whether learned at camp or in the wider world - that can contribute to various programs. These skills range from cooking to yoga.

Programs for camp residents include a wide range of artistic and sport activities: water skiing, tennis, golf, dance, wakeboard. Campers can specialize in these programs, yet have time to enjoy other activities as well. Instructors are well qualified and trained.

There are plenty of out trips, by bike and canoe for example, to explore Camp Timberlane's natural surroundings. And in some sports, there's inter-camp competition.

(A wakeboard is the latest thing; it's like a snowboard, but on the water. It's called a wakeboard because you can use the wake of a boat to launch it, and it can also jump the wake. Along with water skiing, this is a major choice of teenage boys and girls.)

(There's even a specially designed boat, the Tige™ boat, for wakeboarders. It sits very low in the water, and creates a huge wake.)

(Skateboards, snowboards, wakeboards, all fascinate teenagers. They're inexpensive, and you can even make your own board. You can decorate it to express yourself, and don't have to display a logo. A board is portable, usable almost anywhere in a city, and hard to regulate.)

"Camping," Lowes says, "offers a great deal to all concerned. Parents and kids get a break from each other. Guided by camp staff, kids learn independence, responsibility, and community living skills. And the friendships formed in camp, last a lifetime."

While Timberlane maintains traditional camping values, it has a philosophy of inclusion. Most, but not all of the campers are Jewish; and all are welcome.

There's a Friday evening Shabbat dinner and service. Each service has a theme, like friendship or caring, and is put on by campers. Brit's father Barry Lowes, still active at 81, in Timberlane, does the Friday benediction.

Camp Kadimah - Generations of Memories

A Jewish identity is a great gift. Jewish Camping creates the possibility for building Jewish leaders through peer to peer education, lasting friendships and fun, informal Judaic programming that kids remember and cherish for a lifetime.

universities are some of the ways that campers can involve themselves further in camp life.

Younger campers enjoy a range of special programming including outings to the Atlantic Ocean, local farms, a camp carnival and theme days. Our Machar program, for our oldest campers 14-15 year olds, is designed to be challenging and fun, addressing Israeli culture and politics, as well as Jewish ethics.

Our Counselor In Training (CIT) program gives 16 year olds the chance to experience working on different types of programming throughout camp, working with campers in cabins, and leadership training. The CIT program incorporates volunteer opportunities with local camps and towns to encourage leadership and tzedakah. A 5 day trip in Atlantic Canada promotes CITs learning about local culture, small Jewish communities, and visit beautiful Atlantic Canada.

Camp Kadimah is a place where generations have danced and sung the same songs. A place of first loves, first accomplishments, and standing ovations. It is a place where kids can feel a part of a community of peers, and be given a chance to shine at what they do best.

Camp Kadimah is entering its 65th summer on the beautiful shores of Lake William, two hours outside of Halifax, Nova Scotia. We offer a wide range of activities for children ages 7-16 including arts and crafts, land sports, water-ski and wake-boarding, sailing, canoe and kayak, Red Cross and Royal Lifesaving instructional swim, drama, Israeli song and dance, and scouting. As a proud member of Canadian Young Judaea, our program team and schlichim from Israel ensure fun Zionist content to inspire a knowledge and love of Israel in our campers.

At Kadimah, we take a holistic approach to programming, exposing campers to a full range of programming, including a four day camp wide Maccabiah colour war, camping trips to National and Provincial parks, and local sites, theme days, a hockey marathon, and softball, basketball and volleyball house leagues. Optional sport teams, art projects, camping trips, boating races, nature programs with ecologists from nearby

Top camping at low costs

Camp Eitan has been directed by Rabbis Michael Levine and Moshe Weinberg for the past 29 years.

Both teachers at Eitz Chaim Schools, they offer the most in camping for the lowest price. The prices include door-to-door bus transportation within a designated area, hot kosher lunches (under COR supervision) and basic instructional swimming.

Also included are gymnastics, overnights, computers, arts & crafts, weekly trips and a varied sports program. The girls & preschool camp is located at 475 Patricia at Eitz Chaim Schools. The boys camp is located at their Spring Farm Campus. They offer modern air-conditioned facilities for their indoor activities.

A big hit in our boy's division is our baseball camp, offered at our same low price. Coaching, video instruction, practice and game situations are aimed at helping campers at the lower skill levels, as well.

Our older girls' division designed to meet the needs of girls grades 3-5, also offers an optional baseball camp.

In our preschool division, special daily events, preschool classrooms, a weekly theme and a caring staff provide the younger child with a safe and happy summer experience.

Camp Moshava Canada – Camping above all the rest!

Camp Moshava Canada, continues to be proud to be the only Orthodox, Zionist, Bnei Akiva camp in Canada. The camp is situated on 250 acres of beachfront property in the beautiful Kawartha Lakes region.

We are very excited to announce the appointment of our new director, Rabbi Yitzchak Etshalom. Rabbi Etshalom is familiar to our camp, serving as Camp Rav last summer. He has an extremely impressive background, having worked in Jewish communities with both camper age children and counsellor age staff. Rabbi Etshalom has fantastic ideas to improve all areas of camp to make every camper's and counsellor's summer better than ever.

The camp's regularly scheduled days include informal Jewish education, instructional swimming in an outdoor heated pool, canoeing, water-skiing, sailing, a full sports program, thematic arts & crafts, and drama. Special days include colour war, sports day, canoe trips, overnights, hiking, nature trips, and chesed program.

Moshava has a Beit Midrash and an outdoor Beit Knesset, an unparalleled indoor Recreation Centre (Matnas) featuring regulation size basketball, volleyball and floor hockey courts as well as an indoor/outdoor stage. The camp boasts a well-rounded program, which includes an extensive high ropes course, rock climbing wall, biking, a ball hockey rink, basketball, soccer, and water activities on our spectacular waterfront.

At Camp Moshava, no matter one's requirements, all campers' dietary needs are met with tasty and nutritious kosher meals. Our 2nd service salad bar is extremely popular with the campers and staff.

Campers range in age from graduates of grade 3 through grade 9 and enjoy either a 4-week or 6-week session of exciting and challenging programming. Moshava also offers a 2-week "splash of camp" (Nitzan) program designed for grade 2 graduates.

What makes Camp Moshava unique goes far beyond facilities, events and personalities. The atmosphere and camaraderie that exists amongst staff and campers is truly special. Only those who have actually participated in a Shabbat at Camp Moshava Canada can truly appreciate what the experience is like. Camp Moshava is not just a summer camp experience; it's an experience of a lifetime!

CYJ Israel Programs is the final phase of Canadian Young Judea's Leadership Training Programs and is exclusively for 17 year-olds. The program is a unique summer experience, combining leadership development, seminars, nature hiking and touring. The "Biliimniks" explore varied Israeli lifestyles and at the same time discover their Jewish identity.

The participants travel around the country, spend time with groups of teens visiting Israel from other countries, meet Bedouins, Druze and Bahai communities, and enjoy all that Israel has to offer: snorkeling, beaches, water parks, camel and donkey rides, Israeli culture and fafalel.

During the tour, participants will criss-cross Israel from Metula to Eilat and from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea. Qualified madrichim (counselors) on a ratio of one madrich for every 15 participants lead each group. They are chosen from a pool of senior staff members who attend our affiliated camps. Tiyyulim (hikes) are led by a staff member who is a tour guide licensed by the State of Israel. Each group has an Israeli staff person and a medic as necessary.

CYJ Israel programs is the perfect opportunity for a young person to experience Israel. The programs allow them to emotional and intellectually explore the State of Israel, the Jewish Home Land.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency
Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising
reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Dave Lieberman recommends making cooking easy

By MARCIE SOMERS
Special to The CJN

He's only 28, but Dave Lieberman already has two cookbooks and two nationally syndicated television shows under his belt. With no formal culinary training, Lieberman is one of today's hottest young celebrity chefs.

Growing up in Philadelphia, while most seven-year-olds were playing with GI Joes and reading comic books, Dave Lieberman was in the kitchen with his stay-at-home dad learning how to cook.

"I just loved the comfort, creativity and smell of food," he says.

The young Lieberman would spend hours reading his father's cookbooks, watching the Discovery Channel's Great Chefs, Great Cities and analyzing culinary programs. His first wannabe gourmet meal was steamed salmon wrapped in romaine leaves and dripping with Italian dressing. "It was pretty awful," Lieberman concedes, "but my parents bravely pretended to like it."

Flash forward 12 years. When he was a political science major at Yale University, Lieberman was always entertaining friends with extravagant dinners. He became known for throwing legendary dinner parties, single-handedly roasting, frying and baking while mixing drinks for dozens of friends.

On a whim, Lieberman recruited some friends who were film students and filmed a weekly television show about how to cook. Topics ranged from how to cook with a budget, cooking for a date or cooking for the Hook-Up. The show, Campus Cuisine, aired on New Haven's Citizen's Television. Lieberman soon gained fame among his peers. Students would stop him in the hallways to ask for a "hook-up" recipe. He was also often recognized off campus, as tapes of the show were passed around to New Haven foodies.

In 2003, Amanda Hesser, a New York Times reporter, heard about the young chef and featured him in a front-page article in the dining section of the Times. Immediately his phone began to ring. "I remember walking out of a class and found six messages from television producers and publishers. The best advice I received that day was to get an agent — fast!"

He immediately signed with Hyperion for a two-book deal. His first cookbook, Young and Hungry: More than 100 Recipes for Cooking Fresh and Affordable Food For Everyone was an entertaining intro to twentysomethings, organized by eating occasion, with chapters like "Lazy Mornings" and "Cooking for a Crowd." His second cookbook, Dave's Dinners, focused on dinners and offered recipes designed to satisfy novice cooks, meticulous gourmets and busy families.

He also landed a gig with the Food Network. He is the host of two shows; Good Deal with David Lieberman and the web-based show, Eat This. He also hosts Yahoo! Food's In Search of Real Food.

Lieberman is currently developing a new television show that will be more investigative in nature. "People are more conscientious about what they're eating. They want to know what and where their food comes from, so I'm going to explore what's behind our food — what we should know about our food but don't."

Lieberman has certainly achieved a great deal of success and fame at a young age. In 2006, he was named one of People magazine's 50 hottest bachelors.

"I took a lot of flak from my friends for that one," he says with a laugh. "And contrary to popular belief, it didn't exactly help my love life either."

One thing people are not laughing at is his straightforward approach to cooking. "I like to keep things simple. I don't try to get too fancy."

It's his approach to making cooking easy by paring down on ingredients that appeals to his young audience. It's also what he advises those new to the kitchen.

"Use as few ingredients as possible. Don't try to do so much or use complicated recipes."

Lieberman describes his style as a fusion of his grandmother's cooking with Indian and Asian cuisine. When he was growing up, his grandmother not only influenced the young Lieberman, but also his father. "My dad got a lot of good recipes from my grandmother, so he often made a lot of traditional Jewish food such as brisket and ribs. To this day, there's nothing like my grandmother's kugel, brisket or tongue. And my father's ribs. No matter what I do, I still can't make ribs as good as his."

JEWISH APPLE CAKE from Dave's Dinners

This isn't an innovation or groundbreaking dessert, but I really wanted to include it because it's one of my favourite things in the world to eat. In fact, I can literally eat it all day, or any time of day. If I have it lying around the house, I'll have a slice for breakfast, a slice with some tea or coffee in the afternoon and a slice with vanilla ice cream for dessert. If you're going to make this for dessert, then I definitely recommend the vanilla ice cream part.

1 1/2 lb. Golden Delicious apples, peeled, cored and sliced into 1/4-in. slices juice of 1 lemon
1/2 cup sugar
1 tsp. ground cinnamon

For the batter:
4 large eggs
1 1/2 cups vegetable oil
1 stick unsalted butter, melted
2 cups sugar
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract

1/2 cup warm water
2 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. baking powder

Preheat oven to 350. Mix the apples with the lemon juice, sugar and cinnamon in a mixing bowl and let stand while you make the batter.

Lightly whisk the eggs in a large mixing bowl. Add the oil, melted butter, sugar, vanilla and water and whisk until smooth. In a separate bowl, combine the flour, salt and baking powder. Use a whisk to mix the dry ingredients together.

Gradually stir the flour mixture into the wet mixture and stir just until incorporated. Do not overmix.

Grease and lightly flour a Bundt pan. Pour 1/4 of the batter into the pan, then arrange 1/2 of the apples around the top of the batter. Smooth some batter over the apples. Make 2 more layers of apples, smoothing the batter over them after each addition. Top off with the last quarter of the batter and smooth.

Bake about 70 minutes until risen, the top is nicely browned and a sharp knife inserted in the middle of the cake comes out dry. Serves 12-15.

Food, Scrumptious Food

The unofficial national food of Israel could be a healthy substitute for American junk food.

Hummus – the next healthy snack food in North America?

TEL AVIV — It's practically a national sport in Israel. At sidewalk cafes and bustling fast food joints, diners enjoy the fine art of sopping up delicious plates of hummus and technah with freshly baked pita. Truly a wonder food, hummus is rich in vitamins, high in protein and fibre and free of trans fats. And prepared Israeli style, it tastes fantastic.

Canadians and Americans can begin putting their bread in dipping position because fast food giant PepsiCo recently announced that it has signed an agreement to offer the Israeli-owned brand of Sabra Middle Eastern dip products in North America under its Frito-Lay snack food division.

The agreement, worth $45 million (US), will bring the Sabra line of chickpea and eggplant-based dips and spreads produced by food manufacturer Strauss-Elite directly to American grocery shelves alongside other Frito-Lay products like potato chips, salsa and popcorn.

"It builds on our health and wellness portfolio," Aurora Gonzalez, a spokesperson for Frito-Lay, told the Dallas Morning News. "This fits well with the direction that Frito-Lay and PepsiCo have been taking with health and wellness."

Hummus is a dip or spread made of mashed chickpeas, sesame technah, lemon juice and garlic, and is a staple not only in Israel, but throughout the Middle East and Mediterranean countries.

Sabra, the top-selling and fastest-growing hummus brand in the United States, was founded in 1986 as an American outlet for fresh, Middle Eastern-style salads catering to New York residents who craved genuine Israeli cuisine.

In 2005, having acquired market share in mainstream supermarkets, the brand piqued the interest of Strauss-Elite, which bought a majority share in the company. The most recent deal, to be concluded this month, grants PepsiCo a 50 per cent stake in the business, bringing Sabra into a stable of hundreds of snack, drink and cereal brands that together generate more than $35 billion in revenue every year.

For the Strauss Group, one of the largest players on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, the chance to tap into PepsiCo's marketing muscle makes it possible to get North Americans just as hooked on hummus as Israelis are.

"Sabra will lead the freshness revolution in the United States and Canada, consistent with notable emerging consumer trends in the world today," said Strauss president and CEO Erez Vigodman.

So say goodbye to burgers and hot dogs, and don't be surprised if Israeli hummus starts turning up at health-conscious tailgate parties. (Israel 21c)

Nursing home resident freezes to death

By RHONDA SPIVAK

Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Regional Health Authority (WRHA) is investigating why a developmentally challenged Jewish man froze to death after he apparently went outside for a cigarette at the Jewish nursing home here.

Barry Collen, 74, died of hypothermia after being outside for 3½ hours in -20 Celsius weather. He was found by a Sharon Home worker at around 4:30 a.m. on Jan. 2 in the outdoor courtyard of the Sharon Home at the Kamee Centre in Winnipeg's north end several hours after he had entered the area to have a cigarette.

Ann Collen, Barry Collen's sister-in-law, said that she "found out about Barry's death from the police. The Sharon Home didn't even notify me that he had died."

According to Saul Collen, Collen's nephew, "The Winnipeg Police were the first to be called in to the scene. Barry apparently fell and banged his head while outside in the courtyard and was found lying in a pool of blood."

"They have a smoking room [at the Sharon Home], but he had been banned from the smoking room because he smoked too much... If he'd been allowed in, this wouldn't have happened," Anne Collen said.

"When he first became a resident of the Sharon Home, Barry was allowed to smoke in the smoking room. But at some point that changed. I don't really know why exactly," Saul Collen added.

Anyone wanting to enter the courtyard where Collen's body was found is required to enter a code, but no code is needed to get back inside. It's not known why Collen couldn't get back inside.

"It seems that once inside the courtyard, the door may have locked on Barry, and he couldn't get out. We're not really sure how or why this happened. Although there is a key pad to get in, there isn't a key pad to get out," Saul Collen said.

"We are investigating all the circumstances of his death," WRHA spokesperson Heidi Graham said.

Winnipeg Police have ruled out any suspicious cause of death.

According to his sister-in-law, Barry Collen had the intellectual capacity of a five-year-old as a result of a condition he was born with.

He also had Charcot Marie Tooth, a neurological disease that made it difficult for him to feel cold in his feet and fingers. It also affected his balance and made it very difficult for him to use buttons or zippers.

Because of these facts, Anne Collen feels that staff should have kept a close eye on him during cold weather.

"They should have been checking on him," she said, adding that she questions why it took Sharon Home workers so long to find him, regardless of the exact cause of death.

"The medical examiner's office told us that Barry was fully clothed and was fully zipped up when he was found in the courtyard. Barry had a down-filled parka. Because of Barry's medical condition, he wouldn't have been able to zip up his parka himself, so I think that an orderly or other staff member from the Sharon Home must have done up his jacket before he went outside," Saul Collen said.

"The courtyard is all surrounded by glass, so in the daytime it's easy to see into it. But I don't know if there are any lights there at night," he said.

He added: "Barry was a roamer. It would have been usual for him to roam around the building during the night and also to go outside. There is a security desk at the main entrance of the Sharon Home, and when he went out the main entrance to go for a smoke, he would be seen by security. But to get to the courtyard, you don't have to go through the main entrance."

Sandra Delorme, Sharon Home president and CEO, did not respond to calls for comment on this story. But she told Winnipeg's Jewish Post and News that Barry was competent enough to head out for a smoke.

She added that staff didn't become alarmed when Barry didn't come back to his room at night, because he had a tendency to roam around the building day and night, and it wasn't unusual for him not to be in his room.

She noted that Collen had been a resident of the home since 2004 and had been going to the courtyard for years to smoke without incident.

"No one from the executive or board of the Sharon Home has had any contact with our family since Barry's death, not even to express condolences," said Saul Collen.

Johanna Abbot, director of Manitoba's office of the Chief Medical Examiner, said that an autopsy confirmed that Collen died from exposure.

Co-operation among Jews, Native groups

Ahenakew was later approached by a reporter from the Saskatoon StarPhoenix, and in the course of a three-minute exchange, he said Hitler "fried six million of those guys" to prevent Jews taking over Germany or Europe.

"Jews owned the goddamn world and look at what they're doing. They're killing people in the Arab countries," he told the reporter.

Asked about the Holocaust, Ahenakew said "how do you get rid of a... disease that's gonna take over, that's gonna dominate, that's gonna everything, and the poor people, they..."

Ahenakew later apologized for his remarks, but in 2005, he was convicted of willfully promoting hate and fined $1,000. He appealed, and in 2006, a Court of Queen's Bench judge overturned the decision and ordered a new trial.

Farber said native leaders have condemned Ahenakew's remarks and that despite his rant, "even in situations like this there are silver linings."

"The six-year battle in the Ahenakew case has solidified our relationships with First Nations," he said.

The Jewish and Native communities have co-operated on a number of issues, including land claims and the residential schools scandal. "We had the extraordinary pleasure of hosting 18 AFN chiefs on a trip to Israel last year.

"This matter brought us closer together," Farber said.

Islamic woman seeks protection from Canadian legal system

Family Matters

by John Syrtash

B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 26 years

Question: I am a 40 year old woman from Somalia and of the Islamic faith. Seven years ago my husband signed a contract agreeing to give me an Islamic divorce and he has since broken that contract. I am now much older, it is now much more difficult for me to remarry within my faith and I have suffered great emotional anguish. Moreover, my husband now refuses to give me an Islamic divorce unless I consent to go to an Islamic sharia court to resolve our issue over the custody of our 9 year old child. I am afraid that if I go I will lose before such a court. I know that the Ontario government doesn't allow these courts to enforce their rulings in the Ontario courts, but Ontario sharia courts don't care about such enforcement and never did. I would simply be completely shunned from my family and the community or punished socially in other subtle ways. What can Canadian or Ontario law do to help me if I was brave enough to have its Courts intervene? Can I seek civil damages for his putting me through all this anguish?

Answer: The Ontario court will likely assist you. Under laws I was privileged to develop under Canada's Divorce Act and Ontario's Family Law Act, a Judge can prevent anybody from pleading their case or defending themselves from a family lawsuit if he or she has failed to remove barriers to their spouse's religious remarriage. In the Islamic religion a man grants a "talaq." In the Jewish faith spouses consent to a "Get". So, if you asked for custody, child/spousal support or property division and your husband tried to make his own claim or tried to defend himself, an Ontario Judge would likely issue an Order that he must first remove barriers to your religious remarriage before he could do so or lose all his legal rights under Ontario family law.

In Ontario, the Supreme Court of Canada decision, arising from Quebec, may or may not apply, depending on the facts. Section 56(5) of the Ontario Family Law Act allows a Judge the discretion to set aside any part of a separation agreement or Minutes of Settlement or the entire agreement if the contract contained a provision in which there was an exchange of money or "other consideration" for the removal of barriers to one's religious remarriage, such as a Get or a Talaq. In other words, a contract for a Get or a Talaq may not be legally valid. In my view, where one was "blackmailed" into giving a Get on certain unfair terms an Ontario court may set aside such a contract and refuse to enforce it hence no damages. However, where the contract was not "unfair" perhaps an Ontario Judge will allow damages and apply the Supreme Court case.

Cancer specialist named new CEO of Jewish General Hospital

MONTREAL — Dr. Hartley Stern, a cancer specialist who currently heads the Ottawa Hospital Regional Cancer Centre, will be the next chief executive officer of the Jewish General Hospital (JGH).

Stern, who assumes the post March 10, succeeds Henri Elbaz who was CEO for 16 years and worked for a total of 32 years at the hospital.

A Toronto native, Stern is also provincial head of surgical oncology with Cancer Care Ontario.

He has been in Ottawa since 1994, when he was appointed surgeon-in-chief at the then-Ottawa Civic Hospital and chair of the department of surgery at the University of Ottawa.

He has been in his current position since 2000. Four years ago, the cancer centre was integrated into the Ottawa Hospital and became an expanded program of cancer services, research and education. He will continue in his present job until the end of February.

Stern's clinical specialty is colorectal cancer.

JGH says he will be a good fit for the hospital, which two years ago opened the state-of-the-art Segal Cancer Centre, a comprehensive treatment, support and research facility that uses a multidisciplinary approach.

"A new era in the evolution of one of Quebec's most important health-care institutions is underway with this appointment," said JGH president Samuel Minzberg in making the announcement.

"We are very optimistic about the future of the JGH under Dr. Stern's leadership. [He] brings extensive experience as an academic, surgeon, health-care administrator and as an advocate for quality improvement in the health care system."

Minzberg noted that during Stern's tenure, there has been a major capital investment in cancer services in Ottawa and the creation of a regional network, as well as an improved standard of cancer surgery in Ontario as a whole.

War criminal Michael Seifert stands one step closer to extradition after the Supreme Court of Canada turned down his request that it review a lower court decision permitting his removal to Italy.

The high court gave no reasons for its decision, but its refusal to hear the case leaves in place a B.C. Court of Appeal judgment that permitted Canada to extradite Seifert to Italy.

Seifert, 83, was convicted in absentia by an Italian court of war crimes in connection with his service as an SS guard at the Bolzano concentration camp. The Italian court found him guilty of helping kill and torture 11 people at the Bolzano camp in 1944 and 1945.

When the war crimes allegations were raised, the federal government proceeded on two parallel tracks to remove him from Canada. It opened denaturalization proceedings to strip Seifert of his citizenship, and in 2006, then Justice Minister Irwin Cotler signed a surrender order permitting Seifert's extradition.

Seifert challenged both the extradition and citizenship-removal cases in court. In November, a federal court judge ruled Seifert entered Canada and acquired citizenship illegally, "by misrepresenting and concealing his activities during the war and his place of birth." That finding permitted the federal cabinet to strip Seifert of his citizenship, but before it did so, the parallel extradition case was resolved by the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court's decision "means the surrender order signed by the minister is valid and the way is clear for his extradition to Italy," said Alain Charette, speaking for the Justice Department.

Seifert "has been afforded due process under our extradition law," said Charette, adding the Supreme Court's decision marks the last opportunity for Seifert to challenge his removal under Canada's extradition law. Jewish groups urged the government to quickly remove Seifert to Italy.

"Canada is ill-served having this man living amongst us, and we now strongly urge the federal government to honour Italy's extradition request and immediately send the 'beast of Bolzano' back to his home to face the justice he has so long evaded," said Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee.

"Canada's highest court has ruled that there will be no appeal for Michael Seifert. There is nothing further standing in the way of what we expect will be his immediate extradition from this country," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada. "There is only one outcome in this case that will serve the cause of justice and that is for his immediate removal from Canada."

Landy called on the federal government "to deal with the remaining cases of denaturalization and deportation with Nazi-era defendants," while Dimant noted B'nai Brith launched a court challenge last August seeking judicial review of the federal government's decision not to revoke the citizenship of Wasyl Odynsky and Vladimir Katriuk. Courts have found both guilty of lying about their wartime pasts when entering the country.

Youth charged in anti-Semitic vandalism

Durham Regional Police have laid criminal charges against a youth in connection with anti-Semitic vandalism found at a trashed rental property in the town of Bowmanville, east of Toronto.

The young offender, who cannot be identified, has been charged under section 441 of the Criminal Code of causing damage to a rental property, an indictable offence that carries a maximum sentence of five years in jail.

However, police are concerned that unless witnesses step forward, prosecution of the case will be difficult. "We have issues with the case," said Const. Kevin Stuart of Durham Regional Police. "I have no doubt we have the right person. The trouble is finding witnesses."

Stuart said the property, located in downtown Bowmanville, had been rented by a tenant for 10 years, but the tenant had turned the home into a virtual "flop-house" with an open door allowing all kinds of people to come and go.

"The house has been pretty much open to anyone," he said. The problem is "proving who actually did the damage. There are people out there who know."

Alan Schwarz, whose family owns the property, is disappointed at how the case is developing, particularly with the charges, which he said don't reflect the seriousness of the offence.

"It was a horrendous event. It caused huge distress to my parents," he said.

"The whole house was annihilated. No one can live in the house. It can't be salvaged," he said, adding that it has been boarded up since the crime was discovered in September.

Schwarz said he's also disappointed police aren't treating it as a hate crime.

Swastikas were painted on the front door and on the inside, along with the slogans "F-k Jews," "Kike," "white power," and "SS."

"My mom is still extremely upset about it," he said.

"From day one, they refused to acknowledge it was a hate crime. But let's face it. Swastikas, 'F-k the Jews,' 'SS,' 'white power' are not messages of love."

Stuart said he interviewed the suspect and "he told me stuff that might have racial views." But, he added, there's no evidence he's connected to any white supremacist groups.

Assistant Crown Attorney Michael Hill said the racist aspect of the crime could come into play if there is a conviction. At that point, when making submissions on sentencing, the Crown can argue that anti-Semitic graffiti is "an aggravating circumstance."

"The ugly, hateful things on the wall are something that could form part of the submission on sentencing" and warrant a stiffer sentence, he said.

Iran won't get nuclear arsenal: Israeli spokesman

By SHELTON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

The Iranian government wants to finish building an atomic arsenal by 2009 or 2010, but according to Israel's new foreign ministry spokesperson, Iran will be stopped in its tracks.

"The international community will prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon," Arye Mekel said in an interview last week.

Speaking by phone from his office in Jerusalem, Mekel said the major powers are in unanimous agreement that Iran cannot be permitted to develop a nuclear capability. "It's out of the question."

Mekel, the former Israeli consul general in New York City and before that Israel's deputy representative to the United Nations, suggested that the UN can thwart Iran by imposing still more sanctions.

"Iran is very susceptible to economic pressure," said Mekel, explaining that Tehran is vulnerable because it has failed to provide enough employment opportunities for the generation that has come of age since the 1979 Islamic revolution.

Even countries like Russia and China, which have so far been lukewarm to tougher UN sanctions, oppose Iran's quest to build a weaponized nuclear program.

"No one, including China and Russia, wants to see a nuclear Iran," said Mekel, who assumed his current position recently.

Israel is convinced that Iran is trying to produce an A-bomb, notwithstanding a recent U.S. intelligence report claiming that Iran froze its nuclear weapons program in 2003, he said.

Iran, he added, is also working on a long-range ballistic missile program.

Israel has irrefutable evidence that Iran is continuing to work on its nuclear program. "We know for a fact that Iran is trying to produce nuclear weapons."

Iran could achieve its objective by 2009 or 2010, he warned.

Asked what Israel's response would be in that case, he replied, "We don't answer hypothetical questions."

Turning to another issue, Mekel said that 2008 may be a "significant year in the peace process" if the Palestinians fulfil a key obligation under the 2003 "road map" peace plan.

"The Palestinians have to stop terrorism, and if they do, we may make progress," said Mekel.

In a reference to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's summit meeting with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in the United States last November, he said, "Already we see some progress since Annapolis."

Israel stands ready to meet all its commitments under the road map, including the dismantlement of unauthorized outposts in the West Bank, if the Palestinian side complies with its obligations. "Anything that's illegal – the outposts – will eventually be removed," Mekel said.

Mekel said Israel has no intention of building new settlements in the territories and has not built any there in the past decade. But Israel reserves the right to expand existing settlements to allow for "natural growth," he noted.

Though warning that Israel's century-long conflict with the Palestinians does not lend itself to a quick fix, Mekel said the time for a settlement may be ripe because Israel is militarily strong.

"Both sides will benefit tremendously from peace."

Nevertheless, he acknowledged that the Hamas takeover of the Gaza Strip poses an obstacle to a lasting agreement.

"Eventually, the Palestinians themselves will solve this problem. They will find a way. It could be done very peacefully."

In an allusion to Israel's blockade of Gaza, he said, "Life in Gaza is difficult. People in Gaza will have an interest in getting rid of Hamas."

The Israeli government will not even consider the possibility of negotiating with Hamas unless it abides by three cardinal conditions: recognizes Israel, renounces terrorism and accepts previous agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority.

When asked whether Israel should nonetheless sign a long-term truce with Hamas, he said, "We don't talk to them. We have nothing to discuss. You don't stop violence by giving in to terror."

Mekel said Israel's armed forces are doing their best to suppress Qassam rocket and mortar fire from Gaza aimed at settlements inside Israeli territory. "We are acting all the time, operating all the time. We've reduced the number of attacks and casualties."

He would not speculate whether Israel would launch a full-scale invasion of Gaza should the situation warrant one.

But Mekel said that this option remains a possibility, even if Israel is deep into negotiations with the Palestinian Authority. "We'll do what it takes to protect our citizens."

Israel is prepared to resume bilateral negotiations with Syria. "We're ready to talk to all our neighbours."

However, Israel is hesitant to engage Syria when President Bashar Assad hosts such radical groups as Hamas and Islamic Jihad and assists Hezbollah. "We're saying that Syria, while supporting these organizations, is not showing real intent to live in peace."

Asked whether Israel is ready to meet Syria's demand for a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights, Mekel said all issues will be on the table once talks get underway again.

Mekel declined to react directly to a comment made by Mohammed El Baradei – the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency – that Israel's widely reported bombing of a Syrian nuclear facility last September had set "a bad precedent."

"We don't confirm it," he said.

The security situation along the Lebanese border is better today than it was prior to the Second Lebanon War in the summer of 2006, he said. "The United Nations is there and Hezbollah has been pushed back, though the smuggling of weapons to Hezbollah still goes on."

In closing, Mekel said Israel has reason to be thankful as it gets set to mark its 60th anniversary.

"We have to remember that 45 per cent of the Jewish people live in the Jewish state. We hope that more will settle in the next few years. We're by far the strongest country in the region. Our economy is booming. Our high-tech industry is among the top 10 in the world. We have a lot to be grateful for."

Israel cuts Gaza fuel; Olmert says 'Gazans can walk'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pledged Monday that Israel would not allow the Gaza Strip to slide into a humanitarian crisis in the wake of the decision to halt fuel supplies over ongoing rocket fire on the Negev, but later said that gas-deprived Gaza residents "can walk."

"As far as I'm concerned, all the residents of Gaza can walk and have no fuel for their cars, because they have a murderous terrorist regime that doesn't allow people in the south of Israel to live in peace," the prime minister said in broadcast remarks.

Also Monday, a Qassam rocket struck the western Negev. Southern Israel absorbed more than a hundred rockets fired from Gaza last week, but the weekend marked a significant drop in Qassam attacks with only five fired, along with two mortar shells, on Sunday.

Olmert made the pledge to prevent a humanitarian crisis in separate talks with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Dutch Foreign Minister Maxime Verhagen. Mubarak called Olmert on Monday to express his concern over the deteriorating situation in Gaza.

"We will not allow a humanitarian crisis in the Strip," Olmert told both leaders.

"We will provide the population with everything needed to prevent a crisis, but we will not supply luxuries that would make life more comfortable," he added.

Olmert told Verhagen that 75 per cent of children in the Negev suffer from anxiety as a result of the daily rocket attacks.

"Israel does not want to use the same means and shoot without aim," he said. "We are trying to attack terrorists, but we also show the population that it cannot shed itself of responsibility for the situation. We won't allow the Palestinians to fire on us and destroy life in Sderot, while in Gaza life is going on as usual."

Hamas was exacerbating the situation in the Strip in order to increase international pressure on Israel, Olmert said, adding that Israelis were suffering daily from Palestinian terror.

"Hamas is firing on the power station that supplies electricity to Gaza. That is simply crazy," he told the Dutch Foreign Minister, adding, "What would the Dutch government do if it were being fired on daily?"

Verhagen responded that his government condemned the firing of rockets on Sderot, but was bothered by the situation in the Strip and believed Gaza residents needed to be given an alternative to Hamas.

Meanwhile, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Israel sought to "maintain a reasonable humanitarian level" in the Gaza Strip while "waging a war against terrorism."

"The Palestinian people need to understand that there will be no routine living or normal economic situation as long as Israeli citizens are unable to function normally," she told reporters in Sderot.

Ten human rights organizations asked the High Court of Justice on Monday to issue a temporary order to expand the quantity of industrial diesel fuel shipped into the Gaza Strip.

The court had scheduled a hearing on the issue for Feb. 3, but attorneys for the rights groups attorneys argued that the debate should be immediate, declaring that cutting diesel fuel shipments has sparked a severe humanitarian crisis in the Strip, as well as the power blackout in Gaza City.

The groups, led by the Adalah organization, also sent letters to Olmert and Defence Minister Ehud Barak, asking them to rescind Barak's decision last week to close the crossing points between Israel and the Strip. The organizations asked that food, medicines and humanitarian goods be immediately allowed into Gaza.

Also on Monday, a United Nations aid agency spokesperson said that international food aid to the residents of the Gaza Strip would have to be suspended if an Israeli closure of the coastal territory continued.

"We are going to have to suspend operations on Thursday or Friday... because we are running out of plastic bags we use for food, and we are running out of fuel," said Chris Guinness, spokesperson for the United Nations Relief Works Agency, which distributes food aid to 860,000 Palestinians in Gaza.

UN officials said the organization, as well as the European Union, were pressing Israel to allow in fuel and medicine immediately to the Gaza Strip, where 1.5 million people live.

Meanwhile, Hamas political leader Khaled Meshaal spoke by telephone to Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit, who briefed him on international efforts to make Israel "end this tragedy immediately," Egyptian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Hossam Zaki said.

"Israel has a clear international obligation as an occupying force," Zaki said. "The collective punishment should stop immediately."

The European Commission on Monday also urged Israel to restart fuel supplies to Gaza.

"I have made clear that I am against this collective punishment of the people of Gaza," EU external relations commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner said in a statement.

"I urge the Israeli authorities to restart fuel supplies and open the crossings for the passage of humanitarian and commercial supplies."

"Neither the blockade nor the recent military strikes are able to prevent the rocket attacks. Only a credible political agreement this year, as foreseen at Annapolis, [Md.], can turn Palestinians away from violence," Ferrero-Waldner added, referring to U.S.-hosted talks late last year.

Gaza City was dark Sunday night after the Hamas government shut down the Palestinian power plant that supplies some of the electricity in the Strip.

Hamas spokespeople blamed Israel for the power shortage following the closure of the border crossings through which fuel for the power plant is brought into Gaza, but Israel said it is providing 75 per cent of Gaza's electricity and Egypt is providing another five per cent.

"There is certainly a shortage of fuel," an Israeli security official said. "Nonetheless, it's clear that Hamas is blowing up the crisis for its needs, in order to take advantage of the pictures of darkness in Gaza for its public relations needs in the Arab world and the international community."

Four hours after the blackout, Hamas said that five patients died because of the cutoff of electricity in hospitals.

Hamas announced the shutdown of the power plant Sunday morning, which the director of Gaza's electric company, Rafik Maliha, attributed to a shortage of the fuel needed to run the plant.

Despite the blackout in Gaza City, southern and central Gaza — which receive electricity from Israel and Egypt directly — were not affected by the shutdown.

Prime Minister Olmert decided Sunday that the Israel Defence Forces would continue operating in the Gaza Strip, where troops have been targeting Palestinians firing barrages of Qassam rockets at southern Israel.

The Israeli Air Force attempted to assassinate an Al Aqsa Brigade senior official late Sunday night in an air strike in northern Gaza. The official was injured in the strike and one of his men was killed.

Lior Ben-Shimon, 5, was seriously wounded last week when a Qassam rocket hit her neighbour's home in Sderot where she was playing. More than 130 rockets were launched last week from Gaza into Israel. [Israelnet photo]

Israel tests new missile

Israel tested a classified new missile system. Israel's Defence Ministry announced that a missile had been fired from the Palmachim Air Base in the Negev Desert as part of a propulsion-system test. There was no more information forthcoming, prompting the Israeli media to speculate the missile was an advanced version of the Jericho-2, which is believed to be able to carry non-conventional warheads to distances of up to 1,000 miles. Israel has stepped up its development of strategic defence systems amid concerns that Iran could acquire nuclear weapons within a few years.

Israel Briefs

Condolences from Shalit

The father of captive Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit extended condolences to a Hamas official bereaved by Gaza fighting. Noam Shalit sent a condolence letter to Mahmoud Zahar, a senior Hamas leader whose son, a gunman, was killed by Israeli forces near Gaza City this month. "May the day come when neither of our sides knows such pain," read the letter, quoted on Israeli television Channel 2. Zahar, who is considered a hardliner even by the standards of a Palestinian Islamist movement committed to destroying Israel, confirmed receiving the letter but declined further comment. Hamas has been holding Shalit's son Gilad since abducting the conscript on the Gaza border in June 2006. The killing of Zahar's son raised concern in Israel that efforts to retrieve Shalit, perhaps through a prisoner swap, could be impeded.

Top West Bank terrorist killed

Israeli commandos killed the West Bank leader of the Islamic Jihad terrorist group. Special forces surrounded the hideout of Walid Obeidi in Kabatiya village near Jenin on Jan. 16 and called on him to surrender. But Obeidi, who was long on Israel's wanted list for planning Palestinian terror attacks, came out firing his weapon and was shot dead. Two of his comrades were wounded and taken into custody. There were no Israeli casualties.

Gaucher's treatment tested

A worldwide trial of an Israeli enzyme treatment for Gaucher's disease is underway. The trial is looking at a new enzyme replacement drug for Gaucher's disease produced by an Israeli company from plant cells. It's being co-ordinated by Prof. Ari Zimran of the Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem. Gaucher's, the most common hereditary Jewish disorder, is prevalent among Ashkenazim. Those who suffer from Gaucher's have insufficient levels of an enzyme responsible for breaking down extra fatty material, called lipids, in the body. They are treated with enzyme replacement therapy. The safety of the drug was established in animals and healthy human volunteers.

Authors & Poets

The C/JN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. They should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 14. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office. E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Submissions will not be returned. The C/JN will not enter into any correspondence with participants.

C/JN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of C/JN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The C/JN's 2008 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: C/JN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 29, 2008. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 2008.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The C/JN of March 20, 2008. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Flap over World Jewish Congress president's letter to Olmert

By JACOB BERKMAN

JTA

NEW YORK — The president of the World Jewish Congress has yorled the organization's branch in Israel by writing to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert with a plea to allow Diaspora Jews a voice in any decisions on Jerusalem's future.

Ronald Lauder in his Jan. 8 letter, on World Jewish Congress (WJC) letterhead, wished Olmert success during U.S. President George W. Bush's visit to the region and expressed the hope of world Jewry that Israel can attain peace.

Lauder closed the letter urging Olmert that he should take into consideration "the prayers, the hopes and the views of Jews around the world when you discuss the future" of Jerusalem.

"While recognizing Israel's inherent prerogatives as a sovereign state," Lauder wrote, "it is inconceivable that any changes in the status of our Holy City will be implemented without giving the Jewish people, as a whole, a voice in the decision."

Among those complaining about the letter is Shai Hermesh, the chairman of WJC's Israel branch, which was listed at the top of the letterhead along with WJC's world headquarters in New York.

Hermesh said the letter was sent without any consultation with the Israel branch and contradicts the WJC's longstanding policy of keeping out of Israel's political affairs.

"Ronald Lauder is allowed to print a letter or do whatever he wants, but he should take into consideration that never, never, never in the past did Jews in the Diaspora make decisions for Israel," Hermesh told JTA in a telephone interview last Tuesday.

"We feel that Jews around the world are our brothers and their support is very important to us, but political decisions should be taken only by the Knesset and no one else, including the Israeli branch of the World Jewish Congress. That is totally unacceptable by us. Decisions should be taken only by the elected government and no one else."

The flap over Lauder's letter comes as right-wing and Orthodox groups in America are waging a campaign to keep Israel from sharing or dividing Jerusalem in any future deal with the Palestinians. The effort has reignited the argument over what role, if any, Diaspora Jews should have in deciding Israeli policy.

The goal of the letter, Lauder said, was not to pressure Olmert or Israel into taking a hard-line stand on Jerusalem, but to foster debate on what he sees as the most important decision facing the country.

Lauder added that he would not have taken a similar step regarding other territory up for discussion, including the Gaza Strip, West Bank or Golan Heights.

"The letter simply states that it was important to discuss Jerusalem with the Jews of the Diaspora because we all play a role and Jerusalem is a key factor," Lauder said.

The WJC was not going to take an official position on Jerusalem, he added.

"I was speaking for both the World Jewish Congress and the Jews of the Diaspora, and saying please listen to the Jews of the Diaspora," Lauder said.

The spat could signify a clash of personal political differences of WJC officials. Lauder has been a longtime supporter of hawkish factions and leaders in Israel, including Knesset opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu. Hermesh is a member of Olmert's Kadima party.

Lauder's letter comes after Olmert took heat in November for telling reporters that Diaspora Jews should not have a say in what Israel does regarding Jerusalem. Those remarks came as right-wing groups tried to put pressure on the prime minister in the lead-up to the peace gathering in Annapolis, Md.

Olmert later clarified that he welcomed comments from Diaspora Jews, but never rescinded his position that Israel alone is sovereign in conducting negotiations.

The issue of Lauder's letter was raised last week in a conference call Olmert held with members of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish American Organizations.

Olmert, according to one member on the call, said he agreed with Lauder that Diaspora Jews should have a voice and Israel should at least listen to it before acting.

"Olmert completely agreed," said the member, who wished to remain anonymous because the call was closed to the press. "He couldn't have been more forthcoming in agreeing with Lauder's sentiments."

Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) — the official representative of the organized Canadian Jewish community on matters pertaining to Canada-Israel relations — reaffirmed the CIC's desire for Jerusalem to remain the united city it has always been — "with the exception of the 19 years of Jordanian occupation."

"We believe that the democratically elected government of Israel has the right to pursue a course of action based on democratic confirmation by its citizens and that Diaspora Jewry have a right and obligation to participate in the process — albeit through a constructive and respectful engagement of the Israeli government."

Ms. magazine's rejection of ad elicits strong Jewish response

By SUE FISHKOFF

JTA

SAN FRANCISCO — The American Jewish Congress is ramping up its protest against Ms. magazine's rejection of its pro-Israel advertisement.

In a campaign launched earlier this month, AJCongress urged people to write, call or e-mail the prominent feminist publication to "register your complaint at their anti-Israel bias."

It also has enlisted the support of high-powered Jewish feminist speakers, three of whom appeared at a news conference last week.

The ad in question features photos of three prominent Israeli women leaders and the phrase "This is Israel."

AJCongress leaders claim Ms. rejected the ad because of its bias against Israel — a charge hotly denied by the executive editor of the first American feminist magazine, which debuted in the early 1970s.

"We only take mission-driven advertisements," Katherine Spillar told JTA.

"Because two of the women were from the same political party, we understood it as political endorsement," she said. Ms. "does not get involved in the domestic politics" of other countries.

AJCongress President Richard Gordon called that argument "specious," noting that in any parliamentary democracy, the foreign minister and parliament leader are going to be from the same party.

Gordon also noted that none of the women are running for office, and the ad does not suggest support for either of their parties.

He pointed out that Ms. ran a cover story about Jordan's Queen Noor in 2003, and a story in its most recent issue about Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, under the headline "This is What a Speaker Looks Like."

Gordon said the only difference he sees between Pelosi and the three women featured in the AJCongress ad is that Pelosi is not Israeli.

"Ms. magazine obviously is trying to create a legal fiction after the fact to cover their bias at the time of the incident," he said.

Spillar said Tuesday that it is "unfair and untrue" to allege that Ms. magazine is anti-Israel. She said the magazine is running a two-page profile of Israeli Minister of Foreign Affairs Tzipi Livni, one of the three leaders pictured in the AJCongress ad, in its Winter 2008 issue, which hits newsstands Jan. 29.

In a faxed statement, Spillar wrote that the magazine has covered the Israeli feminist movement and the country's women leaders in 11 articles in its past 16 issues.

But the AJCongress ad was "inconsistent" with the Ms. policy of not being politically partisan, and the slogan "This is Israel" in the ad "implied that women in Israel hold equal positions of power with men," whereas "Israel, like every other country, has far to go to reach equality for women."

Speaking later to JTA by phone, Spillar said she "puts the U.S. in the same category as Israel" in terms of having far to go to achieve full gender equality. But the AJCongress ad "was almost a country ad, and we don't take country ads."

Harriet Kurlander, the director of AJCongress's Commission for Women's Empowerment, said that when she originally tried to place the ad, a magazine representative told her that the magazine "would love to have an ad from you on women's empowerment, or reproductive freedom, but not on this."

In other conversations with magazine staff members, Kurlander said she was told that publishing the ad would "set off a firestorm."

Kurlander said the magazine should admit its "cover-up" and "simply print the ad."

Among the Jewish feminists speaking out on the issue was Blu Greenberg, the founding president of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance. Greenberg said that by not accepting the ad, Ms. is "aligning itself with the political far left that wants to delegitimize Israel altogether on the stage of world opinion."

"I wish I could believe that we're overblowing it, but I've been in numerous situations where I've seen the same thing — this total exorcism of Israel," she told JTA. "That's what we're all feeling right now."

She, along with authors Francine Klagsbrun and Phyllis Chesler suggested at the news conference that the magazine's refusal to run the ad was indicative of a pro-Palestinian, anti-Israel sentiment that is rampant within the feminist movement.

"One would have hoped that Ms., known for its independence and for standing up to so many of the firestorms it created, would have stood up on this one," Greenberg said.

"I have seen too much of it in secular feminist circles to know that it is an undercurrent in significant parts of that community," Greenberg said.

Susan Weidman Schneider of Lilith magazine said she was "very surprised" by the refusal of Ms. to run the ad. But Schneider said that after speaking to the magazine's publisher, she believes the ad was likely rejected "out of a place of ignorance" and was not intended as "a willful slap in the face to Israel."

Weidman Schneider, who was not at the news conference, said she considers Spillar's argument "possibly an ex post facto explanation."

She said she told publisher Eleanor Smeal that in retrospect, Ms. would have done better to suggest to the AJCongress that the group shape an ad reflecting a broader range of women's advancement in Israel if any perceived partisanship in the original ad was the impediment.

But beyond the fracas surrounding the actual ad, Weidman Schneider said she is disturbed by the "vitriol" she has seen on Jewish and feminist blogs over the past few days relating to the incident.

"I didn't expect the depth of anti-feminist sentiment that this incident has stirred up," she told JTA, noting that she has read comments referring to "femiNazis" and others suggesting the feminist movement is inherently anti-Israel. "I felt quite chilled."

JTA staff writer Jacob Berkman in New York contributed to this report.

Museum launches Holocaust archives

JTA

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum has launched a search service to access the world's largest closed Holocaust archive.

Survivors and others as of last Thursday may request information from the massive digital archive, which was transferred to the Washington museum this past November. The archives came from the International Tracing Service, based in Bad Arolsen, Germany.

Trained staff will search the archive, and will cross-reference with the museum's own archives and material that the tracing service has yet to share with the museum. The archives relate to wartime incarceration and concentration camps; still to come is material related to forced labour and postwar documentation. All the material should be in hand by 2010, museum officials said.

The material became available after a decade-long negotiations among the 11 countries responsible for the archives. All 11 nations now have copies of the archive.

Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial, launched its own search service last week, too.

About 800 requests, most of them family inquiries, have been received so far by the U.S. Holocaust museum.

Applicants may make requests for information on the web at www.ushmm.org/its or by calling 866-912-4385. The museum is planning outreach programs to communities throughout the United States. More than half of the documents relate to non-Jewish persecutions.

Young Jews reconnect through new Israel tour, Part I

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's not a new concept in the Jewish community. For almost a decade, taking groups of young Canadian Jews on organized tours of Israel has been a technique that has succeeded in connecting thousands of Diaspora Jews with the Holy Land.

For some birthright Israel participants, the free 10-day tour serves as a first taste of Israel, and many return home with the desire to become more involved in their Jewish communities and Israel advocacy.

But Debbie Osiel, the former program and marketing director for Canada-Israel Experience (CIE) and the current managing director for Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP), felt there weren't enough options for Jewish youth to stay connected and get back to Israel.

So Osiel, 27, and the rest of the team at JUMP – a centre located at the corner of Yonge and Centre streets in Thornhill, that serves as a hangout for young Jews – decided to organize a subsidized trip to Israel and market it as a post-birthright program.

"Working at CIE, I had the advantage of seeing the demand for this trip. People used to call all the time because they wanted to go back, but it was too expensive," she told The C/N weeks ago.

Despite having just a few months to plan their inaugural trip, draw up a unique itinerary and spread the word to the Toronto Jewish community, JUMP managed not only to fill every seat of a coach bus with 47 participants, but they even had to turn away a number of hopefuls simply because of space constraints.

From Dec 27 to Jan 8 – for only $899, which covered the flight, accommodations and most meals – Canadian Jews between 23 and 32 travelled to nooks of the tiny Middle Eastern country most hadn't seen on birthright or other organized tours.

With the help of tour co-ordinators in Israel, the JUMP staff worked hard to create an itinerary that offered the participants a deeper, more hands-on experience than they had through birthright.

The focus became experiencing and living Israel – not just seeing it. Each day of the 10-day tour had a theme, and all the themes attempted to offer a different element of Israel – the religious, the spiritual, the Zionist, the humanistic, the historic and the cultural.

Just as the itinerary reflected the many facets of Israel, so to did the dynamic of the participants. Some were religious, others nationalistic. Some had a strong sense of Jewish identity, others were searching for a connection.

Ronen Malik, 30, the Israeli tour guide, who has six years of experience and has led more than 30 birthright trips, recognized that it would be a challenge to connect with such a diverse group.

"It was a challenge. Even the staff members are so different," Malik said as the trip was coming to an end.

"A month ago, when Debbie [Osiel] called me, honestly, I was afraid in the beginning. How was I going to find a balance between all of you?... Although everyone is from Toronto, the background of the kids over here is different. We have religious, we have non-religious, we have people who don't believe in God at all, so it was challenging for sure."

But the staff, consisting of two madrichim, Osiel and Shlomo Buzaglo, 24, as well as two young rabbis, Rabbi Dani Zwick, 29, and Rabbi Daniel Green, 36, pushed forward with an itinerary that challenged the participants on intellectual, emotional and spiritual levels.

The tour began at Maale Hahamisha, a kibbutz hotel organization called Save a Child's Heart, which is based in Holon. Later the same day, they travelled to Kibbutz Shiller to pick tangerines as part of Table to Table's Leket project, which provides needy Israeli families with fresh fruit and vegetables.

They were treated to horseback riding in Ramot Menashe, ATVing in the Golan Heights, touring the grottos of Rosh Hanikra and a jeep tour in the Judean Desert near the Dead Sea, and they even got to try their hand at herding sheep and goats at Neot Kedumim, the biblical landscape reserve in Israel.

They got history lessons at the Ma'apilim camp in Atlit, where Jewish "illegal" immigrants who fled Nazi persecution were held by British authorities at the detention camp that operated from 1939 until 1948.

They visited the Acre Prison in Akko, where some of the founders of the Zionist movement, including Ze'ev Jabotinsky, were imprisoned in the 1920s and where nine members of the Zionist resistance movement were executed in the prison gallows.

But among the lectures, the history lessons and the sight-seeing, the madrichim understood that an Israeli experience wouldn't be complete without some free time for shopping, eating and sampling Israel's nightlife.

Whether the plan was to spend a couple hours at a shuk called Machane Yehuda, spend a Saturday night at a small, sleek bar in Jerusalem called Shlomzi Bar or celebrate New Year's Eve at one of Tel Aviv's hottest clubs called Whisky a Go Go, the JUMP staff made fun a priority, which helped balance the intense program-just outside of Jerusalem. Having arrived less than two hours before Shabbat, it was a perfect time to unwind after a long flight, have a beautiful Shabbat dinner, get to know the group and have some serious discussions.

Hearing Rabbi Zwick lecture to the group about the importance of Shabbat hours after they arrived in Israel made it a more meaningful experience for some.

With the first Shabbat as a group over, the tour began and the participants absorbed all they saw and heard.

The group heard from Arie Ben-Yakov, a hardened kibbutznik at Misgav Am on the border of Lebanon, and they met Avraham Lowenthal, a passionate kabbalist residing in Tzfat, the centre for Jewish mysticism. They heard from Amos Levitov, a soft-spoken Israeli PoW who shared his story about his 3½ years of torture, fear and uncertainty in an Egyptian prison, and they heard from Rabbi Asher Sinclair, a former Hollywood actor, producer and filmmaker turned rabbi.

They travelled to some of the most breathtaking lookout points in Haifa, Jaffa, Jerusalem and the Galle.

They took part in tikkun olam projects, visiting with and bringing toys to children from all over the world who are awaiting free heart surgery provided by an or-ming.

But perhaps most important were the connections made between the 47 young professionals who came from the same city but truly represented the complex diversity that is the Jewish community.

One of the participants lived in Israel until he was five years old. He connects to Israel on a nationalistic level, but considers himself secular. Another was Canadian born, a product of the Jewish day school system, who didn't feel a desire to connect to her heritage until two years ago, and now considers herself a ba'al tshuvah.

Another participant connects both religiously and Zionist-like to Israel, but it wasn't until he was 14 years old that he learned he was Jewish. And another is an immigrant from a small town in Estonia that didn't even have a synagogue, a place "where you could get in trouble for being Jewish," who breaks into tears at the mere thought that there is a place in the world that belongs to the Jews and where she belongs to a nation.

Part 2 of this series will explore the deep connections made by the participants, despite having come from very different backgrounds.

New Israeli spy satellite sends Tehran a message

By YOSSEI MELMAN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The pre-dawn launch Monday of a new reconnaissance satellite further establishes Israel as one of the world's superpowers in space, and grants it an important further intelligence advantage over its rivals.

The primary intelligence contribution of the TECSAR satellite, manufactured by Israel Aerospace Industries, lies in improving capabilities of intelligence gathering on Iran.

Although planned several years ago and delayed a number of times of late, the launch again sends a message to Iran that Israel continues to maintain its superiority in the field of intelligence in space.

The message coincidentally accompanies last week's high-profile launch of an Israeli Jericho surface-to-surface missile, also intended as a signal to the leaders of Iran.

The launch of an Israeli satellite on an Indian missile from a launch site in India bears a number of additional advantages. First, it enables Israel to establish a new point of view in space, allowing it photographic angles and reception of Iranian communications that were not available in prior satellite launches.

The direction of the launch – from the east and opposite to the earth's rotation – gives Israel increased coverage of sites in Iran. TECSAR's optical capability is based on SAR (Synthetic Aperture Radar) technology and on its cameras, which are more advanced than those employed by the Ofek intelligence satellites developed and used by Israel. Image resolution will be better, sharper and of higher overall quality.

The radar technology aboard TECSAR makes its photo and listening abilities usable under all weather conditions, including dense clouds, rain and storms, and at night as well as during the daylight hours.

Even before the Monday launch, Israel could take pride in being one of the world's superpowers in space, along with the United States, Russia, France, Britain, China and India. At the moment, Israel has three reconnaissance satellites in space: Ofek 5, launched in May 2002, Ofek 7, sent into orbit last July, and TECSAR. It also has three communications satellites of the Amos and Eros series. This satellite system furnishes visual and auditory intelligence, interception of media communications and reception of electromagnetic signals from radar.

The launch is also an expression of the growing co-operation between Israel and India in the security sphere as a whole, and in particular in the fields of missiles, radar and satellites.

India is currently the most important export market for Israeli weapons systems, hardware, know-how and technology. A high-level delegation of Indian scientists and military officers, experts in the missile and space fields, is to visit Israel next month, in a further expression of the strategic co-operation between the two countries.

Although command, control and supervision of the TECSAR will be in Israel's hands, foreign media have reported that Israel will allow India access to some of the data sent back to ground stations. This is a sensitive issue for Israel, because it may spark anger in Pakistan.

On the other hand, Iran, which has close ties with India – in the past, India has supplied Tehran with materials and equipment for developing chemical weaponry – would be expected to be angry with India over the launch of an Israeli satellite.

Analysis

Effect of Iran sanctions limited, U.S. report says

JTA

WASHINGTON — Iran's global ties limit U.S. efforts to isolate the Islamic Republic, according to a report by Congress' investigative arm.

"Iran's global trade ties and leading role in energy production make it difficult for the United States to isolate Iran and pressure it to reduce proliferation and support for terrorism," said the review of 20 years of U.S. and U.S.-led sanctions released last week by the General Accounting Office.

"For example, Iran's overall trade with the world has grown since the U.S. imposed sanctions, although this trade has fluctuated."

The report enumerated the sanctions' successes, their limitations, and the difficulties quantifying their effects.

"U.S. officials report that U.S. sanctions have slowed foreign investment in Iran's petroleum sector, denied parties involved in Iran's proliferation and terrorism activities access to the U.S. financial system, and provided a clear statement of U.S. concerns to the rest of the world," the report said in its summary.

The report stated that the reported impacts might be overstated. It pointed out that since 2003, the Iranian government has signed contracts reported at about $20 billion (US) with foreign firms to develop its energy resources, and that banks may be funding their activities in currencies other than the U.S. dollar.

In addition, while Iran claims to have halted its nuclear weapons program in 2003, according to the November 2007 U.S. National Intelligence Estimate, it continues to enrich uranium, acquire advanced weapons technology, and support terrorism.

Finally, the report stated: "U.S. agencies do not systematically collect or analyze data demonstrating the overall impact and results of their sanctioning and enforcement actions."

Pope to change liturgy offensive to Jews

JTA

ROME — Pope Benedict XVI reportedly has decided to change part of the Good Friday liturgy that is offensive to Jews.

The decision was reported by Andrea Tornielli, the Vatican expert at the Italian daily Il Giornale.

The change would affect the Missal of 1962, which the Pope brought back into use. The prayer is not used in most churches, but certain congregations continue to use the old rite on Good Friday.

The prayer, which refers to the blindness of the Jews in refusing Jesus as the messiah, is part of a series of prayers for non-Christians.

The prayer reads: "Let us pray also for the Jews that the Lord our God may take the veil from their hearts and that they also may acknowledge Our Lord Jesus Christ. Let us pray: Almighty and everlasting God, you do not refuse your mercy even to the Jews; hear the prayers which we offer for the blindness of that people so that they may acknowledge the light of your truth, which is Christ, and be delivered from their darkness."

A reference to "perfidious Jews" was dropped in 1959 by Pope John XXIII.

When Pope Benedict brought back the prayer, the chief rabbis of Israel expressed their concern in a letter to the Pope, as did the Anti-Defamation League.

Poll asks if Diaspora should have input on Jerusalem

By ANSHEL PFEFFER

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Only 16 per cent of Israeli Jews think that Diaspora Jewry should be involved in decisions on the future of Jerusalem, according to a poll commissioned by the Shalem Center's Adelson Institute for Strategic Studies.

However, most Israeli Jews also oppose leaving the decision solely to the government: only five per cent of the 500 respondents thought the prime minister was entitled to decide Jerusalem's fate, and only 13 per cent were willing to let the cabinet and Knesset make this choice. Fully 34 per cent said it should be made by all Israeli citizens, and 32 per cent thought it should be made by all Israeli Jews.

Among the 16 per cent who said both Israeli and Diaspora Jews should decide Jerusalem's fate, religious Jews were prominent: fewer than nine per cent of secular Israelis chose this option, but the proportion rose to 29 per cent among religious Jews.

The data were presented during the first day of the Herzliya Conference held last Sunday in the Knesset.

Associates of Prof. Yehzekel Dror, president of the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute, said Sunday that Dror planned to use his speech to the conference to argue that Diaspora Jews should be consulted on such issues, though Israelis should make the final decisions.

In his address in the session on Israel-Diaspora relations, Dror was to argue that Israel and the Diaspora are becoming increasingly distant from each other. Existing data already show an erosion in solidarity with Israel among the younger generation of Diaspora Jews, and Dror believes that existing programs are insufficient to reverse this trend, his associates said.

Dror, they added, blames this crisis on the Israeli establishment's view that Israel is by definition the centre of the Jewish people and its consequent rejection of the Diaspora. He therefore plans to argue that the role of Diaspora Jews in Israel's affairs should be upgraded. Instead of merely being a source of financial aid, they should become "consultants," his associates said.

Venezuela and Iran use oil to build alliance against West

By LARRY LUXNER

JTA

CARACAS, Venezuela — It's nearly impossible to find flour, eggs or fresh milk in the neighbourhood supermarket, but in Venezuela you can fill your car's tank for just 6 cents a gallon even as world oil prices hit $100 a barrel.

That's not the only paradox in President Hugo Chavez's country, the largest oil exporter in Latin America.

Under its leftist president the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela — famous for miniskirts, beauty queens and plastic surgery — has aligned itself politically with the Islamic Republic of Iran, among the world's most conservative Muslim nations.

The growing friendship between Chavez and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, despite the vast cultural differences of Venezuela and Iran, is of great concern to many because both leaders are attempting to use the oil wealth of their countries to spread abroad an anti-America, anti-West and often anti-Israel message.

"Chavez is making introductions for Iran throughout the region," warned Daniel Erikson, a senior analyst at Inter-American Dialogue, a U.S.-based center for policy issues relating to the Americas. "Iran is thereby able to use the entree provided by Chavez to multiply its contacts throughout Latin America."

Robert Bottomo, the publisher of the Caracas newsletter VenEconomy Weekly, says the Iran-Venezuela alliance has more to do with common adversaries than common values.

"It's all part of Chavez trying to promote himself as a leader of the Third World," Bottomo said. "Venezuela and Iran are both against the imperialists."

The Chavez government recently signed four agreements with Ahmadinejad, including joint ventures in a plastics mold factory, a binational bank and a $1 billion binational fund, as well as a deal to train 200 Iranians as petroleum technicians.

This brings the number of accords signed with Iran to 190 and follows the establishment of regular flights between Caracas and Tehran on Conviasa Airlines.

"Some people call that route Al-Qaida Airlines," joked a Cuban-born industrialist who has lived in Venezuela since 1977 and a Chavez critic. "Culturally, we don't share one drop of religion or revolution with Iran."

Venezuela says it produces 2.3 million barrels of crude oil daily, of which 700,000 barrels goes for domestic consumption. The rest is exported, mostly to the United States; trade ties persist between the two countries despite all the harsh rhetoric.

Venezuela's state-owned oil company, PDVSA, also owns the Cigo retail chain and several major U.S. and Caribbean refineries.

Over the years, Venezuela's membership in OPEC also has solidified its political ties with Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Iraq and other leading Arab oil exporters. One of the more dramatic buildings in downtown Caracas is the 370-foot-high Ibrahim bin Abdul-Aziz mosque, a gift from Saudi Arabia.

At the same time, Chavez has downgraded his country's ties with Israel.

During the Second Lebanon War in 2006, Chavez recalled the charge d'affaires of the Venezuelan Embassy in Tel Aviv. Venezuela was the only country to take such a drastic step; not even Egypt or Jordan withdrew their ambassadors.

"Israel after a while had no choice but to take back its ambassador, too," said Rabbi Pynchas Brenner of the Unión Israelita synagogue in Caracas. "They now have relations again, but there is no Venezuelan ambassador in Tel Aviv. Relations are in the freezer."

Indeed, the issue of Israel's ties with Venezuela is so sensitive that the Israeli Embassy in Caracas refuses to discuss the subject.

"For the time being, I can't give you any comment," the embassy's second secretary, Eldad Golan, told JTA.

Golan was willing to confirm only that the two countries still have diplomatic ties and that Shlomo Cohen is still Israel's ambassador in Caracas.

The Chavez government's cultivation of close ties with Ahmadinejad and simultaneous marginalization of Israel has frightened Venezuela's estimated 12,000 Jews.

"Should anything happen to Iran, such as an attack by the U.S. or Israel, I think there would be repercussions against the Jewish community here in Venezuela," said one local Jewish leader who asked not to be identified. "You'd have hordes of people throwing stones and God knows what."

Venezuela long has been suspected of harboring Hezbollah terrorists, especially in the remote region of La Guaira, near the Colombian border, and on the duty-free tourist resort of Isla Margarita, home to a large Lebanese Shi'ite minority.

Ely Karmon, the director of the Institute for Counter-Terrorism in Herzliya, Israel, said recently that a relatively new organization, Hezbollah Latin America, has opened a clandestine office in Caracas to raise money to finance terrorist activities against Jewish targets throughout Latin America.

Iran's alleged involvement in terrorist attacks hasn't dampened Chavez's enthusiasm for friendship with Tehran — even to the point of trying to impede Argentina's probe into the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish community center, which killed 85. Hezbollah agents acting on Iran's behalf are widely believed to have been behind the attack.

With the U.S. government viewing Chavez as public enemy number 1 in Latin America, and Chavez seeing the United States similarly — he called President Bush the devil at the United Nations in New York — the question is what influence the United States can have to rein in Latin America's most vexing leader.

Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, says the United States should look to Venezuela's neighbours.

"The question is how will the United States handle the ring of small planets around Venezuela, like Bolivia, Ecuador and so forth," he said. "The U.S. does not have an alliance potential in South America to buttress its offensive against Venezuela."

Perhaps realizing that concern, the Bush administration recently created a "mission manager" to share intelligence on Venezuela and Cuba. The administration has five other mission managers: on North Korea, Iran, counterterrorism, counter-proliferation and counterintelligence.

Nina's Home confronts emotional fallout of Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Richard Dembo's French language movie, Nina's Home, or La Maison de Nina, kicks off the Toronto Jewish Film Society's 2008 season.

The feature film, released in 2005, will be screened at the Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal JCC on Jan. 27. There will be two screenings, at 4 p.m. and at 7:30 p.m.

Set outside Paris shortly after the liberation of France in the summer of 1944, Nina's Home unfolds in the House of Hope, one of the residences established by the French government for Jewish children who survived the Holocaust in hiding.

The residence is named after Nina, a survivor whose parents were deported from Salonika, Greece, in 1943.

Nina is portrayed by Agnes Jaoui, a Tunisian Jewish actress who brings warmth and intensity to the role.

The film opens as a brother and sister, Georges and Sylvie, make their way to the House of Hope, located in a clearing in a forest.

Film set outside Paris after liberation

They are picked up by a gardener who works for Nina, a rough-hewn man who spews out a stream of veiled anti-Semitic comments.

Presumably, his insensitive and inappropriate remarks are meant to convey the impression that the Nazis found fertile ground in France for their racist ideas.

Nina is depicted as a capable and resourceful person, managing the residence with a deft hand and, when necessary, cadging food supplies from the American army.

And as hardened as she is, she flinches when she watches film clips of Nazi atrocities.

Life at the residence is quite serene and ordered, but when a group of young men arrive from the Buchenwald concentration camp in Germany, peering like aliens from the train, Nina suddenly finds herself at a loss.

The men are a disruptive influence, getting into fights with the French secular Jewish residents and demanding kosher food.

Dembo flits from gloom to glee. A boy is reunited with his father, only to be told that his mother was murdered in Auschwitz. The heavy atmosphere is soon dispelled when Nina buys a milking cow for the nutritional needs of her charges.

The film tilts at seemingly sacred cows. The prospect of settling in Palestine is a source of consolation for one young man, but his girlfriend scuppers the idea.

"Pea farming in the desert is not for me," she says sarcastically.

The boys learn Jewish prayers, but one skeptic wonders why prayer is needed after Auschwitz.

Georges and Sylvie, the pair who appear in the first minutes of the film, subsequently learn that their father, a soldier in the French army, was heroically killed in action.

He is posthumously awarded a medal at a brief ceremony they attend. But for Georges and Sylvie, it's a bittersweet moment.

Nina's Home is that kind of a film, alternately hopeful and depressing, reflecting the temper of its times.

Nina's Home reflects the temper of its times.

Film looks at Nazi looting and destruction of Europe's art

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Last month, a Rhode Island federal court ruled that the forced sale of art by Jews in Nazi Germany was equal to theft.

Last September, a Montreal man claimed ownership of a Gustav Klimt painting he says was stolen from his Austrian grandmother during the Holocaust.

In the Netherlands, the daughter of a Jewish art dealer, Nathan Katz, is claiming 17th-century works owned by Dutch state museums, which she says were stolen by the Nazis.

These news headlines make the documentary The Rape of Europe, running at the Bloor Cinema in Toronto from Jan. 25 to 31, highly topical (bloorcinema.com).

The Rape of Europe tells the story of the systematic theft, plunder and destruction of Europe's art and culture during the 12 years of Nazi rule.

American GIs prepare to return Leonardo da Vinci's Lady with an Ermine to the Czartoryski Museum in Cracow, Poland, from which it had been stolen by the Nazis.

It had always been Hitler's dream to create a great art museum in Linz, Austria, as a monument to his legacy. To do this, Hitler set out to obtain - by purchase or plunder - the greatest art treasures of Europe.

Soon, art collecting became the main hobby of the Nazi elite. Advancing Allied soldiers in 1945 found more than 20,000 art works belonging to Hitler's second-in-command, Hermann Goering.

Organized looting from Jewish households by the Nazis began in earnest with the annexation of Austria in 1938. As Hitler's troops advanced across Europe, the works of the masters, including Leonardo da Vinci, Rembrandt and Rafael, were removed from galleries and private collections and shipped to Germany.

In France, the amount of artwork confiscated from Jewish-owned collections and galleries was so vast, they had to be stored in the Musée Jeu de Paume, used solely for this purpose.

Nazi plunder was not discriminating. Everything was taken - good, bad, valuable and worthless. Paintings, sculptures, furniture, china, Judaica. Nothing was left behind.

It is estimated that 22,000 pieces of art were shipped from France to Germany. Concentration camp inmates with knowledge of art were used to sort through the huge piles. Goering is said to have taken 700 artworks from France for his opulent hunting lodge outside Berlin.

The plunder of cultural property was conducted in a systematic manner. In typical Nazi fashion, a department, the ERR, was set up to deal specifically with Jewish artwork collected in the occupied countries.

The advancing Soviet armies were not blameless. Trophy brigades were sent out to seek out art left behind by the retreating Nazis. Repatriation after the war stopped in the 1960s, and the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg recently admitted that 74 paintings looted from the Nazis' stash were in its possession.

Still holding a grudge, the Russian government ruled that captured German loot was considered Russian property.

Despite U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt's order to respect cultural and historic monuments, the advancing Americans were not blameless, either.

During their advance into Italy, the Allies were forced to destroy the ancient Monte Cassino Monastery, built in 592 CE.

The bombing of Florence was intentionally undertaken with extreme precision to avoid collateral damage to historic buildings. However, a similar bombing raid in nearby Pisa destroyed the Camposanto, a cemetery that dates back to the 12th century and contained hundreds of 14th-century frescoes. Restoration on this building and its frescoes is still underway.

Repatriation of stolen artwork is a complicated endeavour that is still going on today. Based on the book The Rape of Europe by Lynn H. Nicholas, this film, directed by Richard Berge, Bonni Cohen and Nicole Newnham, begins and ends with the story of Klimt's famed golden portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer, the wife of a wealthy Jewish Viennese sugar merchant, taken from Viennese Jews in 1938 and now the most expensive painting ever sold at $135 million.

This film also examines the heroic deeds of the Louvre and Hermitage staff members to protect their priceless collections and the dedicated work of one curator in France who secretly catalogued all the looted work stored in the Musée Jeu de Paume storehouse.

The Rape of Europe, which was the closing film of last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, is short-listed for an Academy Award nomination. It is a fascinating and timely look at the deliberate looting and destruction of art and culture by Nazi Germany.

Michael Holt's new album reflects his spiritual sensibilities

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Michael Holt took seven years to put together his latest album, Windows. But that's because he wanted it to be a thing of beauty, he said, something that would truly reflect where the artist's deep, spiritual sensibilities lay.

Anybody listening to the CD will likely agree it was worth the wait, and then some.

Holt, a former member of the popular U.S. indie group The Mommyheads, has crafted a sublime record that mixes his considerable talent and musical influences – including but not limited to the Beatles, Bob Dylan, Ravel, Inti Ilmiani, Ron Sexsmith and obscure Russian composer Alexander Scriabin – into a tasty, radio-friendly yet still challenging work.

Holt purposefully tried to meld classical and pop-rock forms together on the album and the outcome is inspiring – from the opening track, a gorgeous rendition of Scriabin's Prelude 15 for Piano that flows seamlessly into the plaintive Holt composition Way Up Past to the end tracks of the acoustic guitar ballad Gold and Holt's Prelude for Sand, a haunting composition for piano, cello and viola.

In between, Holt gives the listener some tongue-in-cheek fun with songs such as All the Michaels in the World – “it's about all the facets of myself who loved my wife,” he told The CJN – and You Are Still Here For Me, a pop ode to his dead grandparents and the happy childhood memories of time spent at his family's summer home in Cape Cod.

Much of the theme of the album deals with the ongoing separation between him and his wife of 11 years, Cora, a subject that is of deep concern and confusion to him.

“We still love each other, and we want to honour that love. I think people are able to be friends and feel love for their exes,” he said. “This album, lyrically, is about a marriage coming gracefully to a close. It's about asking what we all sometimes think, ‘Am I really into the person I'm with?’ [The song] Gold is about when we started seeing other people.”

Holt is the first to admit he's a man, and an artist in a state of reinvention, finally finding his own true musical voice and more importantly, his true life.

“I had a near-death experience a couple of years ago that... made me ask, ‘Am I really living my life the way I want?’” he said. The answer was no.

Windows, he said, marks the beginning of his “real commitment to my own music. I concentrated on just making the album I wanted to make, sad and beautiful. I'm really into beautiful music right now.”

A native of New York City, Holt, who turns 40 this February, has called to sleep when I was a toddler, making up my own melodies,” Holt said. “I started piano when I was three. But I'm mostly self-taught.”

Holt was also always interested in spirituality from an early age.

“I'm the first person in my family to believe in God,” he said.

While in college, Holt studied eastern religions and delved into Taoism and Buddhism. It's there, he said, that while experimenting with drugs, he had a revelatory moment where he discovered “the god within. The aspect of myself that is divine.”

But recently, after feeling overworked and stressed, Holt made a decision to observe Shabbat.

“I do it in my own way,” he said. “But I knew I needed to have dedicated down time. So I took Saturdays off. I didn't initially conceive it as the Sabbath. But that's what it's turned into. It's about the time to put aside the worldly concerns that keep your mind so occupied... and open up this space where you can appreciate life.”

Holt said plans are in the works for a Mommyheads reunion tour later this year. But for the time being, he's focusing on promoting his new solo effort.

While he continues to survive financially by giving private piano lessons, living off an inheritance from his grandparents and aggressively selling his CD on his seemingly relentless tour schedule, Holt's hoping to finally break out into the big time with Windows.

The album will be going out for distribution to CBC Radio soon, and with the added exposure, Holt hopes his music can reach a new audience.

“My goal is to get to a place where my music career can support itself, for it to become self-sustaining,” he said. “To be honest, I want more recognition. But in a more general sense I think the goal is to create more beauty and add it to the world.”

Mission accomplished.

New fans and old can catch Holt and his ensemble of 22 musicians at the launch concert for Windows on Jan. 25 at The Music Gallery, 197 John St., with opening act singer-songwriter Tanya Philipovich.

“It's gonna be an orchestral show. It'll be a lush ensemble... a fun, exciting extravaganza,” Holt said.

Toronto home since 1999, when he moved there to accompany his Canuck wife back north after first meeting her while playing in Toronto on tour with the Mommyheads in 1991.

He comes from a family of Jewish, atheist, left-wing political advocates, he declares. His parents, grandparents and great-grandparents were all involved in the socialist movement, civil rights and union activity in the United States from the early days of the 20th century.

Though he didn't follow in the same political vein, Holt comes by his musical talent honestly. His mother was a folksinger/activist for a brief time, he said.

ASHKENAZ FOUNDATION PRESENTS THEODORE BIKEL

Ashkenaz Foundation presents Theodore Bikel in his first Toronto appearance in more than 20 years. An icon of song, stage and screen, Bikel performs a mix of songs in Yiddish, Hebrew, Ladino, Russian and English. Bikel is backed by his long-time pianist and musical director, Tamara Brooks, as well as Toronto's own folk-roots fusion group Beyond the Pale.

Born in Vienna in 1924, Bikel's multi-faceted career began in Israel and in London. Featured in many films, television and stage productions, he originated the role of Baron Von Trapp in The Sound of Music on Broadway, and portrayed Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof in more than 2,000 performances. He was also a renowned folk-singing troubadour who co-founded the Newport Folk Festival and was involved in the 1960s Greenwich Village folk scene.

Toronto Centre for the Arts, George Weston Recital Hall, 5040 Yonge St. $45, $60, $75. Saturday, Feb. 2, 8 p.m. Ticketmaster, 416-872-1111 or www.ticketmaster.ca. Film on Nazi Art Theft: The Rape of Europa, Richard Berge's 2006 documentary (U.S.) with Nicole Newnham and Bonni Cohen, takes an in-depth look at the systematic theft and destruction of art at the hands of the Nazis, and the journey to rescue and retrieve these lost and missing treasures. The film spans seven countries and features interviews with experts, as well as rare archival footage.

The Rape of Europa is an epic chronicle that charts the 12-year attempt to eradicate the history of Jewish art and culture, and the efforts of monument officers from the U.S. army, archivists and art lovers to track down and return these stolen items to their rightful owners. Based on the acclaimed book by Lynn H. Nicholas. Opens at the Bloor Cinema, Jan. 25. 416-516-2331, www.bloorcinema.com

Israeli-Arab-Canadian Film: Canadian Friends of Peace Now presents the Israeli film, Mashallah (Hebrew and Arabic with English subtitles). Israeli cinematographer Eytan Harris' refined documentary unravels a complex story about murder driven by nationalism, so wittily that it almost seems a fascinating fictional feature. The organization also presents the Israeli-Palestinian-Canadian film group, Voices Forward. Sunday, Jan. 27, 4 p.m. Royal Theatre, 680 College St. $5 or PWYC.

Names in the News: Five authors of non-fiction books have been selected as finalists for the Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature.

Administered by the U.S.-based Jewish Book Council, the $100,000 prize is the largest of its kind in the Jewish literary world and honours an emerging author in the field of Jewish literature who has written a book of exceptional literary merit. Last year's winner was Tamar Yellin for her novel, The Genezah at the House of Shepherd. (The prize is awarded to fiction and non-fiction works in alternating years.)

Current finalists are Ilaana M. Blumberg for Houses of Study: A Jewish Woman Among Books; Eric L. Goldstein for The Price of Whiteness: Jews, Race and American Identity; Lucette Lagnado for The Man in the White Sharkskin Suit.

Theodore Bikel

My Family's Exodus from Old Cairo to the New World; Michael Makovsky for Churchill's Promised Land: Zionism and Statecraft; and Haim Watzman for A Crack in the Earth: A Journey Up Israel's Rift Valley.

Mezzo-soprano bypasses academia for music career

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Lauren Segal was nearing the completion of her master's degree, she needed to make a rather unique decision about which career path to pursue.

She could remain in academia and earn a PhD in physics. Or she could parlay her beautiful mezzo-soprano voice into a life of opera and classical music.

Fortunately for audiences, she chose the latter.

"I definitely love physics – it's fascinating," said Segal.

"But I was pulled towards music, because I have so much love and passion for it."

Segal will be showcasing her talents in the upcoming Canadian Opera Company (COC) production of From the House of the Dead, a powerful drama based on a Fyodor Dostoyevsky novel, which he wrote from his own experiences in a Siberian pris-

The opera runs from Feb. 2 to 22 at the Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts in Toronto.

In the deeply emotional production, Segal plays the part of Aljeja, an innocent boy who, like many of his fellow prisoners, creates diversions to cope with the desolate conditions in which he is confined.

"The character I play represents hope and beauty, so it has been interesting to try and find the balance between the oppression he faces, along with all of the hope," Segal said. "I am one of the only women in the story, so it has been exciting to adapt masculine traits for my character."

Segal recently graduated from the COC Ensemble Studio.

Lauren Segal

a dynamic training program for young opera professionals that provides advanced instruction, hands-on experience and career development opportunities.

She was one of several hundred people to audition for only a handful of spots in the program.

"It has been an incredible training experience," Segal enthused.

"It's very intense with coaching for vocals, acting, diction and dancing."

Born in Johannesburg, South Africa, Segal came to Canada when she was 10 and started singing while she was an elementary school student.

She didn't start studying classical music until she was in university, but as she began her formal training, she demonstrated a clear penchant for it.

She is the winner of two Metropolitan Opera National Council Auditions Encouragement Awards.

"Winning those awards was great encouragement for me," Segal said. "I am heading in the right direction."

"It showed me that I am heading in the right direction."

Muslim beauty queen plays Anne Frank in Frankfurt

JTA

FRANKFURT — A Muslim former beauty queen is playing Anne Frank in a new stage production in Germany.

Asli Bayram, a daughter of Turkish immigrants who won Germany's national beauty pageant in 2005, has since turned to acting and plays Anne Frank in a one-woman show that opened this week in Frankfurt.

According to the Israeli newspaper Yediot Achronot, the tale of the Jewish teenager who documented her family's doomed efforts to hide from the Nazis during World War II holds special resonance for Bayram. Her father was shot dead by a German right-wing extremist when she was 14, an attack that she witnessed and which left her seriously wounded.

"By means of my work I want to prevent such terrible things, and to act against extremist ideology," Yediot quoted Bayram, now 26 and a law-school graduate, as saying.

"People must always be reminded that they have to keep an eye on what goes on around them, to prevent such phenomena," she added.

Bayram's portrayal of Anne Frank has been received warmly by Germany's Jewish community as well as professional drama critics, Yediot reported.

Recently, Segal appeared with the COC as part of the Opera Under the Stars Concert in Ottawa and made her main-stage debut as Siébel in Faust.

Recent concert performances include Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Bruckner's Mass in F minor and Haydn's Lord Nelson Mass.

As for the future, this budding star wants to stay the course.

"Being happy and supporting myself through music, here in Toronto, is what I enjoy," she said.

"As long as I continue to enjoy this, I will keep doing it." For tickets to From the House of the Dead, log onto Commentary magazine forged a niche for itself in American letters

Commentary Magazine 1945-59, by Nathan Abrams, published by Vallentine Mitchell.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It is quite a claim, but a plausible one nonetheless. According to The Andrea and Charles Bronfman Center for the Media of the Jewish People, Commentary, a monthly journal published in New York City, has been the "most influential" Jewish publication since the appearance of the first Jewish newspaper in Amsterdam in the 17th century.

Nathan Abrams, the author of Commentary Magazine 1945-59, almost agrees with that assessment, allowing that it was "one of the most influential" magazines of our times during that period.

Although its circulation was relatively limited, Commentary was a "must read" for American conservatives, often sharpening the national debate on a wide array of political and cultural issues. Commentary was also a voice for many young and upcoming writers and intellectuals, ranging from Philip Roth and James Baldwin to Daniel Patrick Moynihan and Irving Howe.

Widely considered a beacon of the neo-conservative movement, Commentary was immensely influential, far surpassing smaller periodicals such as Partisan Review and Dissent.

Yet strangely enough, as Abrams—a British academic—points out, it has never been the object of a monograph or book, at least until now. With this meticulously researched and felicitously written volume, the gap has been admirably filled.

Commentary's guiding spirit was its first editor, Elliot Etelson Cohen, who was born in Iowa in 1899 and raised in Mobile, Ala., the son of a small dry goods merchant.

The youngest freshman in Yale University's history, Cohen majoring in psychology and philosophy. As an undergraduate, he joined the Menorah Society, an association of intercollegiate clubs for Jewish university students formed in 1906 in reaction to anti-Semitism. Burning with a passion for writing, he edited the Menorah Journal, which, as Abrams observes, he fashioned into the template of Commentary.

Norman Podhoretz, a former Commentary editor

Elliot Cohen, Commentary's first editor

Cohen also had his heart set on being a professor of English at Yale, but his hopes were dashed when one of his teachers told him, "Mr. Cohen, you are a very competent young man, but it is hard for me to imagine a Hebrew teaching... at Yale." Having been rejected, he turned to literary journalism as a freelance writer.

A liberal, Cohen became a Marxist and a Trotskyist during the Depression, joining a host of Communist-front organizations. But for reasons cited by Abrams, he moved away from communism, finding lifelong salvation in true-blue conservatism.

In 1934, with his wife pregnant with their first child, Cohen took a position as director of public information of the New York Federation of Jewish Philanthropies. He disliked the job, but it enabled him to form relationships that would be of use to him later in his career.

A monthly, Commentary was founded by the American Jewish Committee (AJC), a major organization that was established earlier in the century to counter anti-Semitism and fight for the rights of Jews. The AJC envisaged a magazine of the highest quality whose content would range from the universal to the Jewish.

Cohen was hired in December 1944, taking a pay cut to be its founding editor. Several months later, he brought out the inaugural edition, which featured articles on, among other topics, the prospects for rebuilding Jewish communities in war-ravaged Europe, the new United Nations, the decline of the American theatre, the recent British elections and anti-Jewish demagogues in the United States.

The articles, studies in universalism, were written by such luminaries as the historian Salo Baron and the art critic Harold Rosenberg. They were heavily edited, by Cohen, who was determined to avoid parochialism.

Although he was primarily concerned with politics, Cohen felt he had a responsibility to publish features on the general state of culture, as well as short stories by such emerging voices as Isaac Bashevis Singer and Saul Bellow.

Unlike many of his contemporaries, he was intensely interested in the Holocaust, a subject generally downplayed before 1960. And so Commentary was the first U.S. magazine to print excerpts from The Diary of Anne Frank.

A byproduct of Cohen's interest in the Holocaust was his fixation with American anti-Semitism and race hatred. This, in turn, engaged him in the African-American struggle for civil rights. In this respect, Cohen was following the lead of the AJC, which believed that Jewish rights could only be protected when the rights of all other citizens were defended.

With the passage of time, however, Commentary, strangely enough, began to link the civil rights struggle with communism.

Cohen's anti-communism reached "obsessive levels," Abrams notes. He considered it his prime obligation to expose what he thought was the greatest threat to human freedom—totalitarian communism. To him, the Soviet Union was as evil as Nazi Germany. Only U.S. military might could stop the tide of communism. Almost every article in Commentary "was refracted through the prism of the Cold War," and ironically, Cohen marginalized writers who dissented from his view.

Cohen promoted a bolder concept of Jewishness. As Abrams puts it, "Cohen did not want a culture born of apologetics, separatism or mediocrity... He rejected defensiveness and victim status [and] called for a positive approach to Jewish history."

Since Cohen was not a Zionist, Commentary's early coverage of Zionism was distant and even embarrassed. But after the proclamation of Israeli statehood, his attitude mellowed and his editorial direction changed.

He now carried more articles on Zionism and Israel and argued that the Jewish state was essential in the U.S. campaign to contain Soviet expansionism in the Middle East, and that the United States should be more supportive of Israel.

Its focus on the Holocaust notwithstanding, Commentary supported West Germany's integration into the western alliance. Cohen believed that "the future of western democratic civilization" rested on the new Germany, and that Jews should be "realistic" about it. Abrams has no problem with Cohen's position, but claims that Commentary tended to be "apologetic" when reporting on outbursts of anti-Semitism in West Germany and public approval of the return of former Nazis or collaborators to influential jobs.

By 1951, Commentary's circulation had risen to 20,000 from 4,000 in 1945. (It stands at 27,000 today.) Abrams says that Cohen's "blend of cosmopolitanism, cultural sophistication, anti-communism, energy and open Jewishness" was appealing.

Time, in a glowing piece, described it as "one of the best magazines in the United States," and the New York Post opined that, in anyone else's hands, it "might have become just one more of the tediously sectarian magazines which are produced in the hundreds."

Yet, as the 1950s wore on, Commentary lost its impetus and readership dwindled, due in part to its "boring predictability," Abrams writes.

Cohen, who had always suffered from depression and would ultimately commit suicide, was hospitalized in 1956, and a bruising succession struggle ensued.

Norman Podhoretz, a young scholar of English literature from Brooklyn whom Commentary discovered in 1952, replaced Cohen and reigned supreme until his retirement in 1995.

Podhoretz—whose son, John, will succeed incumbent Neal Kozodoy as editor next year—abandoned Cohen's hardline anti-communism, but eventually, Commentary became a bastion of neo-conservatism, thus coming full circle.

East Coast Hockey League all-stars set sights high

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

We all know about the well-trodden path young hockey players whose last name isn't Crosby take to the National Hockey League. First, have a good junior or college career, then get drafted, attend camp, get sent back to junior or the American Hockey League, work hard, turn some heads and hope for a call-up.

Simple enough, if not particularly easy. But for those who never get drafted? It gets even harder as the odysseys of two young players, one from Toronto, the other from Winnipeg, attest.

Oren Eizenman, the Toronto native, and Jacob Micflikier, the Winnipegger, started the season in the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) - the "AA" circuit that used to be known for bench-clearing brawls and as the last stop for players past their "best by" date.

So far this season, both skaters have impressed in the ECHL - which today is known as a development league and a feeder for the AHL and the NHL - and both were rookie selections to the league's all-star game. Eizenman, who plays for the Fresno Falcons, was named to the National Conference team in the Jan. 23 game, but Micflikier, with the Stockton Thunder, will have to sit this one out. He was sent home to Winnipeg for a couple of weeks to recover from a broken leg and torn ligaments suffered during a call-up to the Springfield Falcons, an Edmonton Oilers affiliate located just west of Boston.

Micflikier, 23, a left-winger, got into one game, showed lots of energy on the forecheck and was practising with the team the next day when he caught his skate in a rut, fracturing his fibula and rupturing the deltoid ligament in his ankle.

He hopes to play later this season, but he's not sure whether he'll resume where he left off or be forced back to the ECHL and asked to prove himself all over again. Before his call-up on Dec. 27, Micflikier scored 10 goals and added 23 assists in 27 games with the Thunder, leaving him 18th in league scoring.

"I consider myself a playmaker," he said on the line from Winnipeg. "I try to create opportunities out there and use my quickness to get to the puck and create chances for my linemates."

At only five-foot-eight and 180 pounds, he knows he's small by pro standards and so he's added a little aggression to his skill set. He'll mix it up in the corners and go to the net - a style expected of much larger players. "I've made that part of my game. That way, coaches won't see my size as a liability," he said.

In his one game with Springfield this season, he started on the second line, but also skated on the power play and was given plenty of ice time. After the game, he was told by his coaches they were impressed with his efforts, but the next day, during practice, his skate caught in a rut in front of the net.

After a visit with family in Winnipeg, he'll return to Springfield, where the team's medical staff will design a rehab program for him. He hopes to get into some games at the end of the season as he did last year, when he joined Springfield for nine games to close out the campaign. Micflikier, who played for four years with New Hampshire Wild Cats of the NCAA, scored three goals and added one assist in that span and impressed enough to be offered a contract with the team's affiliate in Stockton.

Eizenman, a centre, also has an NCAA pedigree, playing with RPI Engineers for four years, while adding stunts with the Israeli national team at tournament time. He was named to the all-rookie Eastern College Athletic Conference (a division in the NCAA) team and scored 99 points in 129 games for the Engineers. He was never drafted and signed a free-agent contract with Fresno, an unaffiliated ECHL franchise.

Winnipeg skater injured during call-up to AHL

Jacob Mieflikier

In 33 games with the Falcons, Eizenman had 19 goals and 19 assists, to place him 15th in league scoring. He was also named rookie of the month for December, during which he scored 16 points.

Contacted at his home in Fresno, Eizenman said playing in the NHL is still his goal. It's one shared by many in the ECHL, and the league touts the fact that over the past 20 years 341 of its players have gone on to play in the NHL.

To join those illustrious alumni, Eizenman, 22, knows he has to play well and turn some heads.

Eizenman's coach thinks quite highly of his player. Matt Thomas, who hails from Mississauga, said Eizenman is "a very good player" who surprised him a little by showing early on that he's also "an impact player."

"One thing that separates him from other players is that he has a very good head on his shoulder. Others come out of big-time college and think they should be an NHLer. As much as Oren thinks that's true, he knows he has to prove himself."

On the ice, Eizenman has lots of speed, good vision, makes accurate passes and knows what's going on around him, Thomas said. "What separates him is that he truly understands what he needs to do to get better. He knows he has to go out and earn the opportunity" of playing in the NHL.

Thomas believes Eizenman should continue to improve and will eventually get noticed by one of the big clubs. He might even get called up early this year for a look by an AHL team.

That would suit Eizenman fine and would be a welcome stepping-stone en route to the NHL. "It's definitely a goal for anyone playing at the ECHL or the AHL level. To work your self up and get as high as you can get," he said.

Canada wins 14 medals at Pan Am Maccabi Games

By DORIS STRUB EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Canadian athletes are home from the 11th Pan Am Maccabi Games, held in Argentina last month, with one gold, five silver and eight bronze medals. Canada fielded its largest ever delegation to the games, 170 people, said Maccabi Canada President Allen Gerskup.

Leading the Canadian contingent at the opening night ceremonies in Buenos Aires was flag bearer Marnie Krell of Calgary.

"It was absolutely amazing — fireworks, music, dancing in an amphitheatre, an outdoor setting with 15,000 spectators cheering us in," said Gerskup. "[It was] so emotional, many were in tears including me."

Twenty countries, mostly Latin American were represented. In all, there were 5,000 participants.

"Our delegation was small by comparison," said Gerskup, "but we felt important. We are such a distance away that we were looked at as kind of exotic. Everyone wanted a piece of our clothing — anything with Canada on it."

"It was cool to see a different country and especially to meet Jewish kids from all over the world," said 16-year-old Robbie Epstein. "I felt so proud to represent Canada. We [the boys' youth basketball team] won the silver medal, but I was disappointed because we were so close to winning the gold. I'm hoping to make the team for Israel in 2009."

David Goldstein, 40, catcher for the gold-medal master's softball team, is still reveling in the experience. "It was my first time and an amazing experience, especially at my age. I thought this could only happen to the young."

All Maccabi Canada participants, including the coaches, were volunteers. The organization is entirely self-funded and receives no financial assistance from any organization. It relied on individuals such as Robert Lantos, Gerald Schwartz and Ned Goodman for support, said Gerskup.

"But never has any kid been denied the chance to play because of money," he declared. "Somehow we find the money."

"Our guys played their hearts out, each and every game," said Michael Epstein, coach of the youth basketball team. "The Maccabi experience was outstanding. What could be better than playing basketball in an international forum with Judaism as the common bond amongst everyone?"

Regional Maccabi Games are held every four years in South America, Europe, and Australia. The largest and most exciting of the international events is the Maccabiah Games, which are held in Israel. The next Maccabiah will take place in July 2009.

"My goal is to bring more people into the organization," said Gerskup. "Sports is the vehicle, and through it comes pride in Jewish identity and a living connection with Israel. Canada will always participate in the Maccabi Games."

Athletes and teams who won medals include:

- Gold (1): masters mens' softball.
- Silver (5): youth boys' basketball (ages 13-14); youth boys' basketball (ages 15-16); Todd Phillips, Toronto, masters swimming, 100-metre freestyle and 50-metre breaststroke; David Grossman, Thornhill, swimming, 100-metre backstroke.
- Bronze (8): gymnastics, Sarah Vizel, Brantford/Dallas; beach volleyball, Marnie Krell, Calgary; chess, Harris Kaufman, Toronto; swimming, Todd Phillips, Toronto, 50-metre freestyle; tennis, Monika and Mike Yuval, Montreal, masters mixed doubles; junior boys' basketball team.

Why buy when I can rent?

To buy or to rent – that seems to be the question on everyone's minds these days.

For me, it's a no-brainer. If I rent, I get to live where I want. If I buy, chances are I'd have to live on a farm in rural Ontario where the land is cheap and modern-day luxuries are nothing but an urban myth.

The smartest decision, of course, would be to take advantage of my parents' big hearts and scrimp and save until I can buy something tiny to call my own.

But I've always been impatient, and right now, I can't help but feel that buying is more trouble than it's worth.

After all, if I am to enjoy the twenty-something single life, do I really need to be burdened with property taxes and home repairs?

Renting rid me of most responsibilities while allowing me the benefit of living in the community of my choice.

It also allows me to put off the future for just a little while longer.

Buying a house comes with an expectation that I should fill it with a cute husband and even cuter kids.

Sure, a condo is always an option, but then it becomes a matter of "accepting" rather than "expecting."

You might expect to fill a house one day, but buying a condo might make me feel like I accept the fact that I might be single for a long, long while.

It's a silly way to rationalize things, I must admit, but something tells me I shouldn't tempt fate.

I look at many of my friends who have been in home-buying mode lately, and almost all of them are thrilled when they tell me about their purchase.

Still, I can't help but think of one friend who called me and sounded extremely dejected.

"Hi, I'm moving to Barrie," she said.

It turns out she was moving to Richmond Hill, but to this urbanite, it might as well have been Orillia or some other quiet town up north.

When I asked her why she was settling for something so far away, she said, "Because it's a good investment?"

I could tell the phrase was meant as a statement of fact rather than as a question, so I let it go.

Another friend of mine said that while she had to sacrifice location, it was well worth it to satisfy her expensive tastes.

"In our case, we can't even afford a crappy house south of Steeles Avenue," she said.

"Young couples are craving new homes with all the upgrades – hardwood, staircases, the whole shebang. That can only happen north of Steeles at this point in time, so we say OK and play in our new lovely homes up near the North Pole!"

I don't think she minds too much, though.

When I asked her when she was coming down to see my new pad on Bloor Street, she told me she'd visit when her newborn daughter goes out on her first date – in 25 years.

I guess for some people, suburbia has more appeal than the downtown life.

Choosing to rent does make me feel like I'm quite a few steps behind my more mature friends who are investing in their future, rather than a fleeting good time.

On the other hand, I feel pretty lucky to be able to enjoy my fast-paced lifestyle for at least a few more years.

I don't doubt there will be a time when I will want to exchange the city's bright lights for the lights coming out of the new 24-hour Wal-Mart.

But for now, I think I'll bask in my youth for just a little while longer.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

Dear Ella,

It's another new year, and once again my husband has made a useless resolution that I know he'll never keep. Sure, I smile and say, "Good for you, dear" and I try to appear supportive, but I know inevitably that his resolve will only last a month or two before it fades away.

Every year we go through this, and every year I play along. The reason I play along is because Marty's resolutions are my resolutions. If he wants to lose weight, I do, too. If he wants to exercise more, I do, too. If he wants to tighten up the spending, I do, too. You get the picture, right? He can't make a commitment on his own. He has to take me with him for the miserable ride, and every year I play this game, but it's getting old and boring, and I hate being set up for failure. How do I get out of this gently? I don't want to discourage him from trying. I just don't want to be part of it.

Resolution Rescue

Dear Resolution Rescue

It's very commendable for you to have joined your husband in his resolutions year after year, but it's not necessarily helpful. Marty is coming from the mindset of "there is strength in numbers" or "misery loves company" – I'm not sure which one. He obviously needs support to make his commitments work, and who better to support him than his spouse?

That being said, a resolution that has any chance of working needs thought, planning and preparation. You can't just jump on the resolution bandwagon and expect to be successful.

If Marty is really serious about his resolutions, he can certainly get support from someone who is experienced and trained to give it. If it's weight loss, he can join a weight loss group, or if he needs one-on-one attention, he should try a dietician. If it's exercise, he can join a fitness club where he will meet people who are serious about achieving the same type of goals.

As his spouse, you can support him by encouraging him and cheering him on at every little successful step along the way. By doing this, he has your support without you actually having to go along for the ride. Perhaps you may even benefit without officially joining his cause.

May you both have a successful year in whatever you do.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The sage Nachmanides described as an inverted bow the rainbow that God placed in the sky to express God's covenant with Noah: "[God] had not made the rainbow with its feet bent upward because it might have appeared that arrows were being shot from heaven... It is indeed the way of warriors to invert the instruments of war which they hold in their hands when calling for peace."

Your child may feel fear in the presence of a stranger and cry uncontrollably. The tears pour out of her eyes. Your heart crumbles. You feel compelled to wrap your entire being around his little body and protect him through the same powerful inner force that allows a terrified mother to lift a car off her baby.

We, the Jewish people, are painfully aware of the importance of ensuring our children are safe. We are because the reality that 1.2 million of our children were murdered in the Holocaust caust stabs wildly at our soul. Our consciousness seems to be raised to higher levels and the fear we harbour for the safety of our people is greater when the issue at hand is children.

A piercingly loud peace

But our responsibility to protect our little ones must not only be directed toward our own progeny. We must also take care of those living up the street and others living in countries far enough away that they seem unreal. Consider the following and understand why we are responsible for the children.

According to UNICEF, in the past 20 years, children under 16 have fought in at least 16 wars in 25 countries. In the last decade, two million children have lost their lives because of war.

Armies and soldiers care little about the ages of their enemy. It is standard practice to torture children as part of collective punishment for communities or as a way of extracting information about others. Torturing children! I can think of nothing more inhumane.

Children are frequently tortured for entertainment's sake. They are often forced to kill a sibling. My breath is short as I write this.

Women and girls are regularly sexually abused and raped in war zones. In Bosnia, Herzegovina and Croatia, it was policy to rape teenage girls and force them to give birth to "the enemy's" children. In Rwanda, almost every young girl who survived an attack by the militia was raped. Many became pregnant. Many were ostracized by their families. Many abandoned their babies. Some of them committed suicide.

When atrocities such as these are committed against children, Jew and non-Jews together must create a vibrant movement in the world called peace. It must be loud enough to permeate the spirits of everyone who has the ability to make peace. We must take care of all the world's children

It is not enough to be quiet role models for goodness. We must wade out into the world and convert those who will listen and act on our ability to be peaceful. The motivation for such an aggressive pursuit of peace must be the reality that two million children are dead because of war.

We cannot live in such a criminal world! Of course, we must arm ourselves with weapons and fight wars when called upon to do so. But we must always fight on a second front as well – that of respect, understanding and decency toward others. The children of the world cry out to us. Imagine their terror.

It is time we create an aggressive movement centred on the universal idea of loving your fellow human beings as yourself. An honest and wisely thought out movement for peace is good for the Jews. It is paramount for our world.

Remember your children when they wince in fear.

Hate Arrest Praised

REGINA — Canadian Jewish Congress lauded Regina police for laying hate charges last week against a man who was also fined in 2007 for posting hate online. Police charged Terrence Tremaine, 59, of Regina, with wilfully promoting hate after CJC and Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman made a complaint to police in 2006. CJC said. Police searched Tremaine's home last July.

The former University of Saskatchewan math teacher has been associated with the National Socialist Party of Canada, on whose website he allegedly made the postings, and was fined $4,000 last year based on a human rights complaint from Warman. CJC co-president Sylvain Abitbol said that the postings blame Jews "for virtually all the ills that have beset the world in the last 200 years, from the founding of communism to the [Sept. 11] attack against the United States."

BB Teams With OU

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada will join a number of U.S. Jewish social service agencies in co-sponsoring a March 3 Orthodox Union webcast on "how to take an interview," the OU said last week. The webcast is a project of the Orthodox Union Job Board, which helps people find employment. An acting coach will help a live audience work on body language in order to learn "how to express confidence during the interview process," the OU said. It's the first in a series of workshops to be webcast at www.ou.org/jobs.

Israel Seeks Early Bonds Redemption

NEW YORK — The government of Israel is asking 144,000 holders of long-term Israel Bonds to voluntarily redeem the debt instruments early.

The move is part of an effort by Israel to replace its high-cost, long-term bonds with bonds that mature earlier. Israel Bonds no longer offers bonds with a maturity exceeding five years, and it has reduced the sale of bonds that defer interest payments until maturity.

In a statement, Israel Bonds spokesperson Raphael Rothstein said, "Israel's Finance Ministry recently adopted a debt management program aimed at ensuring continued economic strength. A key component is the reduction of long-term debt, including changing the structure of the country's debt portfolio to securities with shorter maturities and bonds paying interest on a current basis."

"A second element of the program is reducing the amount of bonds maturing in certain specific years in order to better balance its repayment obligations."

The goal is to retire $500 million (US) in debt by Feb. 29 and improve Israel's credit rating, which would save as much as $1 billion in annual interest charges, the New York Jewish Week reported. (Countries with better credit ratings can borrow at lower interest rates.)

Israel has given Israel Bonds a $1-billion (US) goal for 2008, "a major responsibility underscoring the nation's ongoing reliance on Bonds funding," Rothstein said.

Ve'ahavta helps solve ancient medical mystery

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

Staff Reporter

The earliest recorded cases of what we now know was syphilis in the old world date to 1495 in Europe, when Columbus' men returned to Italy after their pioneering voyages to the New World.

Shortly thereafter, sex in Europe was never the same, as a new venereal disease laid waste to Renaissance Europe. Nobody knew how or why.

They do now.

Toronto's Jewish, non-profit humanitarian organization, Ve'ahavta, has helped clear up an old mystery for the global medical community.

Doctors working on relief projects in Guyana for Ve'ahavta have helped confirm that the sexually transmitted disease syphilis was spread to the old world from the new more than 500 years ago.

In 2005, Ve'ahavta doctors collected samples of a disease called "yaws" – found only in certain regions of South America and Africa – for their peers back in North America. Tests proved that both yaws and syphilis share a common bacterial family, treponema pallidum, although yaws is not known to be sexually transmitted.

Sarah Zelcer, director of international programs for Ve'ahavta, explained to The C/N the genesis of the finding.

"Our Guyana medical project was one of our first projects," she said. "And Dr. Michael Silverman [an infectious disease and tropical medicine specialist] who was one of our founding directors, had been going down to Guyana [since the mid-1990s] on mini-medical missions and discovered yaws still in existence."

But the discovery of the relationship between yaws and syphilis was almost never made, Zelcer explained.

Having decided to treat yaws with penicillin capsules, Silverman had nearly eradicated the disease in the indigenous population. In fact, he said the samples collected in 2005 were the last cases his team has seen since.

Still, the samples were enough for Silverman's colleague, Dr. Kristin Harper at the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta who used a phylogenetic approach – study of the evolutionary development of the disease – to confirm yaws as the source of syphilis. At the time, Harper was trying to find the source of syphilis, and she was missing only a sample of yaws to examine.

The recent publication of the discovery has made medical headlines worldwide.

"All the syphilis we see today is from the interaction of Columbus' men with the Amerindians," Silverman told The C/N last week.

Songbook of music and history was an affirmation of the driving force and creative energy of Jewish identity and a movingly beautiful testament to the truth that Jewish youths can, and indeed, do bear the responsibilities of their peoplehood.

Born in the disorienting aftermath of the Yom Kippur War, Boston based Safam was both an invitation to and an inspiration for youthful Jewish engagement in the roiling, mostly anti-Israel atmosphere that hung like noxious gas over campuses across North America. Much like today.

Yasser Arafat, with a pistol holstered to his hip, mocked conscience and decency when he addressed the United Nations General Assembly. Though his chief preoccupation was the murder of Jews, he was held in high regard by many expressions of engaging musical talent and profound cultural insight. Collectively, however, their work represents the social history of more than three decades of Jewish life in North America. For example, to single out but a very few of their more than 100 songs, Leaving Mother Russia, written in 1978, became the fist-pumping rallying cry for the struggle to free Soviet Jewry; Amnesty, in 1983, eerily predicted the fall of the Kremlin; Tribute, in 1984, heightens the eternal, trans-generational reach of the Kaddish; Falasha Nevermore, in 1986, was for many of us our introduction to the plight of the Ethiopian Jews; and Nachamu Ami, written in 1991, has now become the classic musical rendition of the prophet Isaiah's uplifting words. But there are so many more such seminal songs in this collection.

The recent publication of Safam Anthology: The Complete Collection is thus an event to be celebrated. The work is a collection of the group's music from 1974-2007, more than 100 songs, almost all of them the original compositions of Robbie Solomon and Joel Sussman. It contains the music and chording for each of the songs, expanded album notes, the lyrics and an extensive index.

The attention by the publishers to the high-quality production values of the songbook – 363 pages of glossy-finish paper and heavy cloth binding – assures it will be a long-lasting addition to the musical storehouse of any home. In some respects too, the Safam Anthology is a primer of Jewish assertiveness for the generation of the children of Safam.

For more information about the anthology, e-mail Safam@Safam.com or call 1-866-897-2326.

From the editor's desk

Edmonton sits at the near centre of Alberta, astride the banks of the North Saskatchewan River. The rolling hills and the deep river valleys around the city comprise some of the most fertile farmland in Canada's golden West.

The prosperity of the city though, much like the prosperity of the entire West, owed more to its people's strength of character and generosity of spirit than to the bounty of the natural resources that lie, like buried treasure, hidden beneath the earth's surface.

The West is rich in good people.

Helene and Max Sussman were two such very good people. In the middle of the last century, they brought their honesty, their goodness, their inclination toward hard work and their lovingly kept Jewish traditions to Edmonton from points much further east.

Helene died last year; Max some 24 years earlier. No glass and steel skyscrapers bear their names. No tall monuments of granite and polished chrome attest to the fact that they once lived.

But a mere monument of glass and steel, or granite and chrome is a far inferior tribute to the memory of who Helene and Max Sussman were than the deep goodness, profound Jewish soul and vast musical and lyrical talent of their son Joel, who with his friends Robbie Solomon, Dan Funk and Alan Nelson, founded the musical group Safam more than 30 years ago.

Joel left Edmonton at the age of 21, after completing his undergraduate studies at the University of Alberta, and headed to Israel. He studied Hebrew for three months in an ulpan in Kiryat Shmonah and then worked with underprivileged youth in the then young but burgeoning port city of Ashdod.

It would be a transformative year for the young man from Edmonton, altering the course of his life forever. Not to overstate the point, it led him to the calling, the place and the people who would join with him to form Safam.

Safam was – and is – much more than a folk-rock band of singers and musicians who write and perform Jewish music. It

Some of their songs are "political," some are liturgical, some are soulful, but they are all artful. Individually they are

B'nai Brith expulsion hearings adjourned

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A disciplinary committee of B'nai Brith Canada considering the proposed expulsion of more than 14 members adjourned last week without making a decision.

The three-person committee reserved its judgment after a hearing that lasted almost four hours, said lawyer Rochelle Cantor, who is representing the 14 long-serving B'nai Brith members. Cantor said the tribunal "conducted the hearing in the manner they saw fit to conduct it. I'm not certain if they are finished."

Noting the hearing was closed to the public, Cantor said little about what transpired, repeating only earlier concerns she had raised that B'nai Brith had not disclosed the specific facts about each member that warranted expulsion. She pointed out, however, that B'nai Brith called no witnesses at the hearing.

At least 14 members were mailed letters in late November informing them they faced removal for conduct "unbecoming a member of BBC [B'nai Brith Canada] and contrary to the best interests of our organization."

Among the allegations that accompanied the letter were that the members circulated information at the 2006 annual general meeting that "contained serious and unsubstantiated allegations against the organization and leadership."

B'nai Brith's executive committee, which referred a complaint to the disciplinary committee, also alleged an organization called Concerned Members of B'nai Brith Canada circulated e-mails that included "defamatory allegations of wrongdoing, both financial and otherwise."

Cantor said she had not yet presented her case: "As far as I am concerned, the hearing is not over."

Cantor, whose father is one of the B'nai Brith's members facing expulsion, said she planned to call anywhere from 20 to 40 witnesses who would testify that members' conduct was not unbecoming a member of the organization. She pointed out those facing expulsion have been members of B'nai Brith an average of 40 years. One, Lou Ronson, is the organization's longest serving member, having joined the organization 68 years ago.

Approximately 60 supporters and potential witnesses gathered at the B'nai Brith building on Hove Street the night of the hearing. They were greeted by three uniformed police officers. Their presence, along with the disciplinary hearing itself, was the subject of a heated e-mail message circulated to a local lodge.

In the e-mail message, N.H. [Nate] Salter, past president and chair of the board of directors of Forestdale Heights Lodge stated: "I have been a loyal B'nai Brith member since 1955, and in the 53 years since I joined as a proud Jew, I have never heard about members of this organization committing acts of violence or civil disobedience. Yet at a meeting called on Monday, Jan. 21, wherein a so-called tribunal was being held that could have a deleterious effect on our president as well as others... paid police officers [were] on duty."

"To me this is the ultimate in disrespect to our lodge and our members, when we have taken the time to appear at the tribunal in support of our president. Did [B'nai Brith] think that a group of middle-aged Jews were going to storm the meeting and do acts of violence? What an insult to our members when [B'nai Brith] calls in police to restore order when no order has ever been breached."

Ronson said the "policemen had a good time." They kibbized with the supporters. "They had nothing else to do. There was nobody creating any fuss or anything."

In recent weeks, The CJN has devoted coverage to what can only be described as a public smear campaign against B'nai Brith Canada and its parent organization, B'nai Brith International. This attack campaign is being spearheaded by a tiny handful of disgruntled B'nai Brith members. The damaging and defamatory statements made by these individuals – which The CJN has repeatedly chosen to cover – does not reflect the overwhelming support that we have received from our loyal grassroots members, friends and donors from across the country, who have rallied behind us.

B'nai Brith Canada has fully observed due process and abided by its governing constitution in trying to put this matter to rest. The B'nai Brith International Court of Appeals ruled that there was no basis whatsoever to the complaints of this group. Despite the clear judgment rendered by a court of their choice, this fringe group has chosen to pursue a vendetta against B'nai Brith. It would appear that they have opted to put their own personal issues above the welfare of the organization in an attempt to impede our ability to carry out the important work we do on behalf of the entire Jewish community.

B'nai Brith Canada's disciplinary committee, operating under the organization's constitution, convened last week to hear complaints launched against these individuals by the executive board.

This body provided the opportunity to the disgruntled members to present their views in a peer review setting.

Following The CJN's extensive coverage of these individuals' grievances, B'nai Brith learned that demonstrators were being asked to turn out in force. Off-duty police were therefore engaged in order to ensure security and decorum. In the end, only a handful of family members and friends turned out for the hearing.

Pending the review of the disciplinary committee, which is expected to render a decision shortly, it is inappropriate for either of the parties to further comment publicly at this time.

Holocaust survivors group links with CJC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A grassroots organization that represents Holocaust survivors has joined forces with Canadian Jewish Congress to better serve the interests of more than 17,000 survivors across Canada.

Sidney Zoltak, co-president of Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors (CJHS), said his group's association with Congress will permit the organization to do its work more efficiently. "We now have a home, a phone number and a staff person," Zoltak said in a telephone interview from Montreal.

Zoltak, who shares the presidency with Nate Leipziger of Toronto, said CJHS earlier had a good working relationship with UJA Federations Canada, but it was ad hoc and limited.

"It's a better fit with Congress as [Congress CEO] Bernie Farber sits on the Claims Conference board [as does Zoltak]. I have a relationship that is closer than before. We speak to one another, we consult with each other. We're on the same page, working in the same direction," Zoltak said.

"Bernie is our adviser... I hope this relationship continues for whatever time is needed to do whatever we have to do."

CJHS was founded in 1999 to advocate for the welfare of its members and to represent Canadian survivors at the Claims Conference, which negotiates with European states for increased benefits for survivors.

"We were not getting our share," said Zoltak, who added that the organization has held talks with the governments of Poland and Germany regarding compensation issues.

One of the group's first tasks was to create a registry of survivors, which now includes approximately 9,200 names. The organization's potential membership was once 20,000 survivors, but that number has dwindled to around 17,000, Zoltak said.

An estimated 3,000 of that number are living in poverty. CJHS works to ensure that compensation funds go directly to the survivors who are entitled to it and to agencies that provide services to survivors.

The Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors in Montreal, as well as Circle of Care and Baycrest in Toronto, receive funds to serve elderly survivors, he said.

Recently, CJHS negotiated with the Jewish federations in Toronto and Montreal to match funds received through the Claims Conference, he added.

Melanie Simon, Congress' national social policy co-ordinator, is the staff person who will work with CJHS. One of her tasks for the coming year is to create with CJHS a national list of services that are available to survivors and to reach out to communities outside larger centres to locate people who could benefit from services.

Among CJHS's objectives for the year ahead are:

- increasing public awareness about issues that concern survivors;
- co-ordinating volunteers to update the CJHS database of members;
- involving children of survivors in issues of importance to CJHS.

Zoltak said that "we want to engage members of the second generation to step in, in association with our organization, to add youth, intelligence, know-how and to continue our work."

He said there is also room on the national stage for survivors to add their voices to debates concerning the broader Jewish community, as is the case in the United States.

"I think the survivor community has an important message to deliver. Sometimes survivors are neglected and disregarded by the leadership of communities. We want to be part of the leadership of the Jewish community in Canada," he said.

"I know we have an important role still in expressing our opinions," particularly on issues of anti-Semitism, racism and reasonable accommodation.

"A survivor can give a personal history of surviving racism," Zoltak said. "It is real, and I think it is more forceful than just a statement said by somebody."

Portrait of contrasts

United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour issued a statement on Sunday in honour of the International Day of Commemoration in memory of the victims of the Holocaust, which read in part: "This day provides the international community with a sober moment of reflection and remembrance. We must honour the memory of those who fell victims to the most horrendous manifestations of discrimination, hatred and intolerance. In doing so, we reaffirm their dignity as human beings, and our collective failure to extend to them the protection to which they were entitled."

"As we continue to be confronted with expressions and manifestations of anti-Semitism, this day is a call on the world's conscience and a reminder of the acute necessity to confront intolerance, bigotry, prejudice, ignorance and hatred, early and unequivocally. We can truly honour the victims of the Holocaust by pursuing all efforts to extend the real protection of international human rights law to all those who fall victim to its violations."

Alas, it saddens us enormously to observe that the high commissioner's words sound hollow. They seem to be nothing more than an empty, pro-forma concession to the protocolary demands of her office, devoid of gravitas or sincerity.

This conclusion, unfortunately, is inescapable, for Arbour's actions belie her words. The manifestations of anti-Semitism to which she demonstratively points her conscience are unceasingly aimed at Israel, the "Jew" among the nations and, as all anti-Semites obsess, the state of "the Jews."

Last week, for the third time in its brief two-year history, the UN Human Rights Council, whose mission she shares and whose work she supports in a broad sense, rebuked Israel for alleged human rights violations in Gaza. Syria, the internationally well-known, even staunch, defender of the human and governmental rights of the Assad family and their Alawite kinsmen, introduced an anti-Israel resolution that passed by a vote of 30 in favour and one opposed, with 15 abstentions and one delegation absent. Arbour lent credence to the false notion that Israel was to blame for the plight of the Gazans. Speaking to the 47-member council in Geneva and referring to the "level of desperation" of the Palestinians in Gaza, she said Israel must lift restrictions on delivery of humanitarian aid. Only Canada opposed the Syrian proposal.

Adding further moral emphasis to its vote at the Human Rights Council, Canada also announced last week that it would not take part in "Durban II," the UN's world conference against racism, slated for 2009, that's being organized by such poster countries for human rights protection as Libya, Iran and Cuba. Foreign Minister Maxime Bernier and Secretary for State and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney rightly noted that the conference had already "degenerated" into a travesty.

The government deserves high praise. Its actions against anti-Semitism – confronting "intolerance, bigotry, prejudice, ignorance and hatred" – paint a stark portrait in contrast to those of the high commissioner.

25 years ago in The CJN

The issue of Sabbath observance reached the Supreme Court of Canada when a member of the Seventh-day Adventist Church charged that Sears Canada's insistence that she work on Friday night and Saturday, her Sabbath, violated her human rights. A similar case brought by a member of another Protestant church was being heard in Quebec. Jewish groups were monitoring the cases closely.

Frivolous human rights complaints

Kudos to Canadian Jewish Congress co-presidents Sylvain Abitbol and Rabbi Reuven Bulka for injecting a dose of rational thinking into the debate about the investigations into frivolous human rights complaints playing out in Canada ("Some human rights complaints are frivolous," C/JN, Jan. 24). They hit the nail on the head – human rights commissions must be reminded that not all complaints are equal, and investigations must be reserved for the most serious of cases that may have actually subjected people to real hate and contempt.

Maclean's magazine was taken to task for its publication of an excerpt of a book by Mark Steyn, and Ezra Levant is the subject of a complaint for his decision two years ago to publish examples in the Western Standard of the so-called "Danish cartoons," which featured what some believe are derogatory images of Muslims and the Prophet Muhammad.

The Steyn and Levant cases represent an abuse of the system, and, as Abitbol and Rabbi Bulka suggest, it's up to the commissions to set a higher standard.

Israel and the Liberal Party

Israel's right to exist within defined and secure borders has been a foundation of both Canadian foreign policy and that of the Liberal Party of Canada for nearly 60 years.

This commitment began with the support of Canada's then Liberal government of Israel's admission to the United Nations in 1948. Canada's subsequent careful scrutiny of UN General Assembly resolutions and our traditional refusal to support resolutions that are primarily intended to single out Israel for discriminatory treatment must continue. The integrity of Canada's reputation at the United Nations will only be maintained by supporting resolutions rooted in international law. Those resolutions must constructively contribute to the goal of a negotiated two-state solution and reflect the values and principles that Canadians want to promote on the world stage.

Canadian diplomats should continue to build on Canada's long-standing efforts to recommend an alternative peace process, which will end divisiveness and strengthen the relevance and integrity of the United Nations. It was stated in Canada's statement to the 2005 UN General Assembly plenary, that "this alternative process should be based upon, an inclusive and thorough resolution on the peace process – free of divisive rhetoric, accurate, detailed in approach and balanced in outcome."

The Liberal party is also committed to building a growing economic relationship between Canada and Israel. On Jan. 1, 1997, the Liberal government of the day was proud to bring the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement into effect, removing tariffs from most manufactured products. While Canada and Israel have historically had strong commercial relations, this agreement has generated significant business opportunities for Canadians to compete in this growing and dynamic market.

The relationship between Canada and Israel is epitomized by the deep bonds of friendship and family ties that have strengthened the labour and human rights communities in both our countries and changed the lives and hopes of thousands of young people around the world.

Of course, Canadian Jews have been at the heart of this relationship, but Canada's support for the idea of Israel and its affirmation of human values has found deep resonance across religious and cultural communities.

That is why the Liberal policy on Israel and the Middle East is based on the following core principles. To that end we will continue to:

- proudly support, as a cornerstone of our foreign policy, the right of Israel to exist in peace and security;
- call for a two-state solution, of an independent and democratic Palestine alongside an independent and democratic Israel;
- support the right of Israel, like any other state, to be free from threats or acts of force;
- condemn terrorism – from whatever source, for whatever purpose, in whatever form;
- support the push for democracy, human rights, good governance and the rule of law throughout the Middle East;
- push for fairness in the UN General Assembly, where one-sided resolutions serve neither peace nor the United Nations; and
- combat racism, anti-Semitism, hatred and intolerance.

When Israel's right to exist is threatened, it is an attack on the values of every democracy. It is in this context that Israel's fight for existence is our fight. Her struggle for peace and security is our struggle.

Jewish Cuba: an unexpected treasure

By RENA GODFREY

Tears rolled down my mother's cheeks as eight beautiful, smiling Cuban Jewish children walked hand in hand down the aisle toward the bimah of the Beth Shalom synagogue in Havana. They were welcoming the Shabbat Queen, singing Shalom Aleichem.

Seventeen years ago, this heartwarming Kabbalat Shabbat service would not have been possible. In fact, between 1961 and 1991, this synagogue could barely summon a minyan.

Rena Godfrey

In Fidel Castro's regime, religion was not abolished outright. Adela Dworin, president of the Casa de la Comunidad Hebrea de Cuba (known as Patronato), explained, "If a Cuban Jew or Christian wanted to belong to the Communist party, get a job in government or go to university, [he or she] didn't want to openly show an affiliation toward religion. Only the elderly attended synagogue in those years, because they had nothing to lose."

This year, my mother wanted to take her children and grandchildren on a vacation, in honour of her 70th birthday. After some research, she decided on Cuba, as she had never been there and had often heard of the beauty of Havana and the Jewish community that resides there. She chose an all-inclusive resort in Varadero, where everyone could eat and drink as much as they wanted. We expected what most sun-deprived Canadian vacationers crave – the sun, the sea and the beach. What we didn't count on were the unexpected gifts – learning first-hand of a people and their way of life, which is entirely different from our own, and the chance to connect with a small yet resilient Jewish community of 1500, committed to its own survival.

After days of sampling all there was to eat at the resort buffet, and dancing the merengue by the pool, we were ready for something more. Havana was calling, and once we left the gates of the resort, the real Cuba was waiting for us.

As a writer, I couldn't resist this opportunity to meet the Jewish community and interview its leaders. Like any savvy Internet user, I Googled "Jews in Cuba," got onto their website (www.jewishcuba.org), e-mailed the contacts about my trip and my desire to help their community, and then waited for a reply. After a few weeks without a reply, I contacted the Canadian Jewish Congress, who promptly e-mailed me back with the correct contact information and suggested that I call Michael Soberman, national director of the Canada-Israel Experience.

Soberman is in close contact with the Jews of Cuba and has sent approximately 50 Cuban youths on Taglit-birthright Israel trips over the past five years. On my behalf, Soberman immediately contacted William Miller, vice-president of the Patronato, and the connection was made.

Miller supplied us with an extensive list of the Cuban Jewish community's most needed items, ranging from syringes and Tylenol to men's underwear and Shabbat candles. I was taken aback by the long list of medical supplies requested, as I had always thought that Cubans were well taken care of when it came to their medical needs. Even my brother, who is a doctor, questioned the long list of medicines desired.

Little did we know then of the crucial role that the Patronato's pharmacy plays in the lives of both the Jewish and the non-Jewish communities in Cuba.

As Dworin explained, "Health care in Cuba is generally good. When you're in the hospital, you're well taken care of, but when you're about to leave, the doctors will ask you if you have relatives abroad who can help with sending money or medicine. There just isn't the supply of everyday medicines available."

In perfect and articulate English, Dworin's soft-spoken voice carried me back to another time in Cuban history, when Cuba was a safe haven for European Jewry. Dworin is one of two children born in Cuba to parents who emigrated from Pinsk, Poland, before World War II. For many Jews, like Dworin's father, Cuba was intended as a stopover on their way to America. With the war fast approaching, Dworin's father could not save the rest of his family from their demise, and decided to remain in Cuba.

Dworin loved growing up in Cuba as part of the Jewish community of 15,000. She attended Jewish elementary school and high school, and then went on to law school. She pointed out that there was, and still is, no anti-Semitism in Cuba.

"At the beginning of the revolution, the Jews welcomed Castro, as [Fulgencio] Batista was a ruthless dictator, and the Cubans needed a change."

However, with the revolution also came dramatic changes in government policies that many found intolerable. Castro's government confiscated all private businesses and, as a result, in 1961, 90 per cent of Cuban Jews, who belonged to the upper and middle classes of Cuban society, fled. Dworin, then a law student, refused to leave. Cuba was her home, and she and her family remained. Dworin continues to live in the family house in Vedado, a suburb of Havana, blocks away from the Patronato.

Havana is a majestic city, with magnificent buildings still standing but in need of extensive repair, fossil-like remnants of a once-thriving and international Cuban city. Much like the city, the Cuban people are beautiful, highly educated and resilient, but life is hard.

"You won't find anyone starving in Cuba, people walking around without clothes or children begging in the streets, but since the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, and in combination with the American embargo, everyday life is difficult for most Cubans," Dworin said.

She gratefully acknowledges and thanks the Canadian Jewish Congress for being the first Jewish community to pledge its support to the remaining Cuban Jews. In 1961, the CJC's Alan Rose promised to maintain a constant connection to Cuban Jewry by facilitating an annual Passover food drive, which has been ongoing for the last 47 years.

"It's not just about receiving the gefilte fish, matzah and hagaddot. It's about showing our children that they are Jewish and staying connected to other Jews."

According to Dworin, the Passover food drive was also instrumental in strengthening the barely visible Jewish community prior to 1991. After 1991, Castro changed his policy on religion, allowing everyone to worship openly.

When intermarried couples came to pick up the Passover foods, Dworin and the late Dr. Jose Miller, then president of the Patronato, asked those who were non-Jews if they wished to convert to Judaism. The response was positive, as being Jewish also meant having access to a support system that was direly needed.

"As Jews, we are privileged, in that we care about each other," Dworin proudly said.

Miller also contacted the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), asking it to send youths from Argentina to teach the young Cuban Jews, so that they could in turn teach the rest of the community about Jewish life. The plan worked, and Miller's legacy is a now thriving Jewish community.

Miller's grandson, William, a Jewish convert himself, is passionate about keeping the flame alive among Cuban Jewry. He is an electrical engineer, runs the ORT computer centre for 120 students, the Sunday school for 70 kids, rikudim and a summer camp, all housed in the Patronato. A van generously donated by a group from New Jersey transports the children to and from school and helps the elderly and sick get to and from the hospital. The Patronato is the centre of Jewish life, complete with a youth group, a women's group and a seniors' group.

While visiting the pharmacy, William Miller picked up a bottle of medicine and turned to me: "Yes we need your medicines, but we also need to have face to face contact with the Jewish communities from abroad, so that the donors can really see where their donations are going."

Miller is currently making arrangements for Canadian volunteers to come to Cuba to help restore the other synagogues in Havana that are in need of repair. There are five synagogues in Cuba: three in Havana, one in Santiago and one in Camaguey.

Unfortunately, I didn't get a chance to visit the other synagogues in Cuba, but this is not my last trip to this fascinating country. I'm hooked and plan to return.

While lighting the candles at the Kabbalat

Shabbat service with the 70 or so Cuban Jews, I kept thinking to myself that we (Jews in the Diaspora) need the Jews of Cuba just as much as they need us. They need our physical, emotional and monetary support, and we need them to remind us of our good fortune. Living in a prosperous country such as Canada means that most of us are not concerned about whether we'll have enough food to feed our families for the week, or whether we'll be able to purchase a new pair of shoes for our children.

Let us remember that for many of us, at one point in our lives or our grandparents' lives, life was not always as good as it is now, and not too far away is a community in need.

The desire to be a Jew

To be a Jew/Is to desperately desire/
That our descendants/ Desperately desire/To be a Jew.

That poem, written by my husband, Rabbi Howard Joseph, sums up two facets of being Jewish — it emphasizes the generational commitment and the personal or existential aspect.

Norma Banniel
Joseph

For many Jews, religion is about finding personal meaning and fulfillment. They're convinced that this is the best way to live life to the fullest.

Religion is for now. For example, Shabbat transforms my universe each week, and I can't imagine life without it, or without the spiritual cleansing of Yom Kippur, the renewal and enticing dialogue of prayer of Rosh Hashanah, and the family rituals on Passover. Judaism fills my life with significance. Religious Jews declare that they act primarily because they feel commanded by God.

Nonetheless, their rituals are infused with personal meaning that they relate to individually. Both the subjective and divine combine to generate a desperate desire to be a Jew.

The clearer focus of the poem is on continuity, a totally different mode of being Jewish. It speaks of a desperation for the next generation, and it marks the reality for many Jews. We're desperate that our descendants be Jewish, and we're desperate that they should continue that desperation to be Jewish.

We crave continuity. Why?

I believe it's more than a reaction to our peculiar national history of longevity despite anti-Semitism and genocide. I believe it's part of our spiritual and biblical heritage.

Genesis begins with Creation, but death stalks the story. God tells Adam, "You must not eat of the fruit, for as soon as you eat of it, you will die." Death is not a direct punishment, although it's a consequence. The snake says, "You won't die."

How can we understand this tale?

I don't propose to simplify this complex story or make light of it.

But in truth, it holds a key to our own desperation as Jews. For leaving the Garden of Eden, our species leaves paradise, and we come to know our full humanity as finite, imperfect and mortal beings. As individual humans, we die, but our species does not. In fact, reading Genesis 3 carefully, one can find a promise of immortality imbedded in the punishment.

Man is told, "By toil shall you eat," but you will eat. And woman is told that "in pain shall you bear children," but there will be children. So suffering is our personal lot. We are finite, but we shall eat and have children. We shall survive. So there is a promise and a hint of immortality in our finitude.

Is our desperation for descendants our response to the challenge of Genesis? Through our Jewish children, we, as Jews, survive death.

Courageous women challenge Islam to face truth

Nonie Darwish, Ayaan Hirsi Ali, Irshad Manji are brave women, as was the murdered Iranian-Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi. They are some of the few women who have told the world what it's like to be a Muslim woman today, not only in a Muslim country (as in the case of Hirsi Ali and Darwish) but also in the West, where women like Hirsi Ali live under the threat of death.

Recall that she is the woman who was forced to go into hiding after the murder of Theo van Gogh, her filmic collaborator and critic of Islam.

Others are stepping forward: Marina Nemat, a Christian Iranian woman and Zahra Ghahramani (Iranian-Kurdish) have recently published accounts of their torture in the Evin prison, where Kazemi perished.

I don't condemn the practice of Islam per se. But I do stand horrified when it has come to be a religion of terror, oppression, suicide and murder. For those who would excuse the repressive countries these women come from — and others as well — I have no time.

A four part discussion series, "Manufacturing Islam," is taking place here at the University of British Columbia's St. John's College. It featured a keynote address by Zarqa Nawaz, producer of the CBC sitcom Little Mosque on the Prairie. (Unfortunately, the dialogues are on Saturday, so I could not attend.)

In her talk, as reported Jan. 14 in the Vancouver Sun, Nawaz replied to critics who say the show should deal more directly with Muslims engaged in armed conflict by noting that Seinfeld failed to deal with the contentious issue of Jewish settlements in Palestinian territory.

It would be refreshing to have someone who produces a feel-good show about Muslims in the Canadian heartland say, "I don't defend Muslim terror bombers, rapists and people who kill women and children. I denounce Muslims who bomb and kill. It's shameful and un-Islamic, and I condemn it unapologetically."

Instead, she deflects the question away from extremism by mentioning a show about a Jewish comedian.

Back to those courageous women. Some, like Hirsi Ali, have undergone female genital mutilation. The Jan. 20 New York Times ran a picture essay on female mutilation in Indonesia, where 95 per cent of girls are "purified" through this horrendous rite. Right now, my ears are filled with the screams of these innocent girls. Where are the Muslim voices that will defend them?

On Jan. 14 on the supertime CBC news, a Palestinian woman was interviewed about her work with abused women in the Palestinian areas. The real problem, according to her, was the Israeli occupation. Once that's gone, women will somehow become miraculously safe from honour killings and beatings meted out righteously by their husbands.

So it's not an interpretation of Islamic law that allows beating and killing — it's the Jews' fault. How silly of me not to understand this.

More excuses for not facing the facts: Simon

Fraser University professor and former CIA agent Graham Fuller claims: "A world without Islam would still see most of the enduring bloody rivalries whose wars and tribulations that dominate the geopolitical landscape" (Vancouver Sun, Jan. 18). Without Islam, the Middle East would see Orthodox Christians taking up the gun. To him, western colonialism caused the rise of terror in the Muslim street.

I agree that the colonialism of the 19th and 20th centuries did terrible harm. But let's look closely. The Arab Middle East has tried Pan-Arabism, which was killed by rivalries among states and leaders. It tried secular nationalism, which, along with state socialism, ruined economies and left broken promises of triumph in its wake. And now it's turning to radical Islam, which is the new messianism in countries that lack the civil institutions necessary for democracy. The trend is spreading throughout the Muslim world.

Former New York Times journalist Ari Goldman, now a journalism professor at Columbia University, argues that the media don't portray moderates in Islamic thought. But it scares me that the leaders of North American Muslim organizations have not been able to articulate a position that distances them from terror, mutilation and rape, or take to task Muslims who perpetrate horrors in the name of Islam.

"The relentless quest for national deliverance" that Fouad Ajami describes in his book Dream Palace of the Arabs has taken an ugly route. Rather than examine their own repression of women, Muslim societies today seem to be lost in a nightmare.

Canada's many diaspora groups pose challenges

The word "diaspora" has many meanings. Although it has a Greek origin, it most commonly refers to the dispersion and scattering of people from their original homeland and the resulting communities they form in foreign lands. "Diaspora" originally referred to the Jewish community that was scattered after the Babylonian captivity. More recently, it has been used to describe the Jewish communities outside Israel that are dispersed throughout the world.

Of course, there is no longer a homogeneous Jewish community anywhere. North American Jews trace their origins to Russia, to eastern Europe, to Latin America and elsewhere. Anthropologically, there may at one time have been a single Diaspora, but now it's hard to pinpoint a single, common worldwide Jewish community. Yet we're all described as members of the Diaspora.

As Jews in the Diaspora, what, then, do we have in common? We share a common religion, although we choose to practise it in many different ways. We share a common heritage or history that dates back thousands of years. We even, to some extent, share a certain traceable genetic commonality that is evidenced, for example, by the prevalence of certain medical conditions in the Jewish population (such as Tay Sachs disease).

Recently, it has been speculated that Kohanim may even share genetic characteristics dating back thousands of years to the time of Aaron. Moreover, for all our differences of opinions, we share basic common values stemming from the messages and lessons of the Torah and the Talmud. We also share a dark history of oppression. Whether or not we, ourselves, lived in Europe or had relatives who lived in Europe, the experience of the dark days of the Holocaust is part of our collective makeup.

Probably the most accurate description of Jews is that we are members of many diasporas with some degree of commonality, but many differences as well.

Others have appropriated the term "diaspora," as we know it, from the Jewish experience.

Many other religious and cultural communities now want to be recognized as part of their own diaspora. In a sense, it's a badge of honour, a celebration of their origins, or simply a means of reinforcing community cohesiveness and pride.

For example, we recently witnessed members of the Pakistani diaspora united in their opposition to the political turmoil and oppression in their former homeland. We are called upon by the Armenian diaspora seeking world acknowledgment of an unrecognized genocide suffered a century ago. Chinese communities throughout the world are about to celebrate their annual new year festivities. Maintaining links to and celebrating traditions from a homeland is a widespread phenomenon.

In Canada, these various diasporas exist not always because people faced oppression and exile in their respective homelands, but often because they chose to seek better lives in new lands with new opportunities.

Although individuals in the various Canadian cultural communities may use the term diaspora, we would rather refer to the various communities within our borders as constituting the multicultural heritage of Canadians. Since 1982, multiculturalism has been given constitutional status through section 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which guarantees the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians. Official government policy since the early 1970s has recognized and promoted multiculturalism. The federal Department of Canadian Heritage funds programs supporting this policy. In Alberta, the provincial anti-discrimination statute is called the Alberta Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act.

All of the foregoing is a reflection of the long-standing Canadian desire to have our society evolve into what is now a truly multicultural mosaic rather than an American-style melting pot. Some people have expressed objection to this policy, favouring the American approach. However, thriving multiculturalism is the normative and legally protected description of the Canadian way of life.

But a nation with many diverse cultures, with many so-called diasporas, is not without certain problems and concerns. There are issues of adaptation, of acceptance and accommodation by the majority segment of the population, and, on the darker side, issues of hate, discrimination and intolerance. These issues essentially relate to the ability of cultural or diasporic communities to maintain their respective identities in the face of pressures and discrimination they sometimes encounter. The challenge for the various diasporas within Canada is to achieve a balance between their cultural integrities and their Canadian identity.

Scholar questions Holland's wartime image

Holland has had a benevolent image in Jewish circles, perceived as a tolerant and humanistic nation whose population courageously resisted a brutal Nazi occupation and selflessly helped its Jewish citizens evade arrest and deportation. In this connection, Holland's glowing image is also burnished by the saga of Anne Frank, the precocious Jewish teenager who poured her heart out in an extraordinary diary.

Holland's image is continually buttressed by stories in the media of ordinary Dutch burghers who rescued Jews in their hour of duress.

Last October, the Associated Press reported that Hendrikus and Martha Snapper, a deceased couple, were posthumously honoured by the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial authority in Jerusalem for having sheltered a Jewish family, Levy and Rosa de Hartog and their five children, in the town of Naaldwijk. In November, the New York Times published an obituary of Johtje Vos, a woman from the village of Laren who is credited with having saved 36 Jews.

From a broader perspective, 25,000 out of 140,000 Jews were rescued by the Dutch during World War II. Yad Vashem has paid tribute to 4,717 rescuers in Holland, which, after Poland, has more "righteous gentiles" than any other jurisdiction.

Yet 70 per cent of Dutch Jews perished during the Holocaust. Of 105,000 Jewish deportees, only 5,200 survived. Holland's deportation rate is thus higher than any other western European nation.

Diane Wolf, a University of California sociologist who has written a book on this topic, Beyond Anne Frank: Hidden Children and Postwar Families in Holland, is distressed by these stark statistics.

Having done the research, she said that Holland has the dubious distinction of being the only western European country whose Jewish deportation and murder rate was comparable to that of eastern Europe.

"What exactly does this mean in human terms?" she writes. "It means that although Holland's prewar Jewish population was less than half that of France's, more Dutch than French Jews were deported and killed, in both absolute and relative terms."

"If you were a Jew in France, you had a higher probability of surviving," she added in an interview during Holocaust Education Week.

She ascribes Holland's poor record to several factors.

As in Poland, but not in France, the Germans administered Holland through a system of direct rule. "That made it more dangerous to resist," explained Wolf, who headed Davis' Jewish studies program from 2000 to 2001. "There was almost full collaboration by the Dutch civil service and police. Adolf Eichmann said, 'The Dutch are a pleasure to work with.'"

A small minority of Dutch joined the resistance movement and assisted Jews, but a similar number were pro-German and basically unsympathetic to the plight of Jews.

Significantly, the vast majority of Dutch lay low and went about their business as if nothing had happened, she observed.

Contrary to conventional wisdom, the Jews of Holland were not as well integrated into Dutch society as commonly believed.

As a result, few Jews knew Christians well enough to ask for help when they most needed it.

"Jews were seen as a separate group, and on the whole, there was not much interaction between Jews and non-Jews," she writes. "Dutch mainstream society was always very aware of who was Jewish, even if Jews were highly assimilated."

Wolf, whose mother was born in Anne Frank's hometown, Frankfurt, Germany, claims that both the Dutch monarchy and the government-in-exile exhibited "complete indifference" to the fate of their Jewish citizens by virtue of their "lack of concern" over the deportations.

The Dutch railways deported Jews to the Westerbork concentration camp, while Dutch Nazis and local police were involved in the roundup of Jews.

"There was no dearth of Dutch willing to help the Nazis," she said.

As for Anne Frank, Wolf is unequivocal. "The Dutch betrayed her," she said, alluding to the man who informed the Germans where she and her family had gone into hiding in Amsterdam.

During the Nazi interregnum, 5,000 Jewish children, mostly under the age of five, were hidden. Brought to safe havens by members of the resistance, they were passed off as non-Jews so that they and their foster parents would not be exposed to Nazi retaliation.

"They underwent massive identity makeovers in their moves from their natal Jewish families to their life-saving Dutch gentile families, in which their names, places of origin, histories and religions were radically revised," she states.

Dutch rescuers usually hailed from working-class and middle-class backgrounds and were motivated by altruism, religious beliefs or financial gain, said Wolf, who discovered the topic when a Dutch colleague told her about Dutch state involvement in Jewish family reunification after the war.

In general, the children were well treated, though some were subjected to anti-Semitic slurs.

Their problems really began after Holland was liberated from the Nazi yoke in 1945. As one of Wolf's 70 interlocutors admitted, "My war began after the war."

In her estimation, 3,500 hidden Jewish children survived. The rest were betrayed and murdered.

Most of the hidden children were reunited with their biological parents, often in gut-wrenching scenes in which they failed to recognize them and desperately wished to remain with their foster parents.

"It was a traumatic experience for everyone concerned," said Wolf, adding that some parents, whether biological or foster, resorted to kidnappings to reclaim the children.

Ultimately, hundreds of them ended up with their gentile foster parents, much to the indignation of the Jewish community.

In cases where one of the biological parents had died, a child's fate was determined by a central government committee, headed by a strict Calvinist who felt that Jews had to be "saved" from Judaism. The committee's Jewish membership was composed of assimilated Jews, she said, noting that Orthodox Jews and Zionists were excluded.

The sometimes cavalier manner in which these children were treated mirrored broader attitudes toward Jews as the war wound down, Wolf explained.

Refusing to create separate welfare organizations to deal with the rehabilitation of postwar Dutch Jews, the Dutch government-in-exile hewed to the belief that Jewish survivors should be helped by Dutch or international Jewish charities. Dutch authorities claimed they did not want to emulate the Nazis and make an exception of Jews, arguing that special treatment could stoke the fires of anti-Semitism.

Wolf does not buy these arguments, saying that they smacked of insensitivity and, perhaps, anti-Semitism.

"All in all," she writes, "the reception Dutch Jews got when they returned or reintegrated into society was mostly unexpected and quite negative."

In summing up, Wolf claims that the history of hidden children in Holland is not a pretty story, shattering the myth that the majority of Dutch resisted Nazi tyranny and helped Jews.

Similarly, Holland's postwar policies toward Jews, including its miserly attitude toward the repatriation of Jewish property, were at best insensitive and at worst anti-Semitic.

Plant the RMIF in your RRSP and watch it grow.

RMIF Performance

Weighted average annualized return on unitholder's equity has consistently been in the 10% range

Many people really don't know how their RRSP performed in 2007. But investors in the Romsen Mortgage Investment Fund know. That's because they earned 10%, just as they did the year before.

The RMIF generates and distributes income monthly and with automatic reinvestment, an investor's annualized return is even higher than 10% because it is compounded each and every month.

Consistent high returns...that's why investors have increased their investments in the RMIF to over $400 million. Want to see your money grow consistently? Start by contacting Arthur Resnick or Wes Roitman for an information package today.

Shul merger talks called off

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Preliminary merger talks between the Lodzer Centre Congregation and the Pride of Israel Synagogue have ended, after Lodzer members expressed objections at a Jan. 20 meeting to learn about the possible alliance.

"While our members understood some potential benefits of a merger, it was vital to our membership that we preserve the uniqueness of our shul," synagogue president Judy Hazan said in a Jan. 21 news release.

The release said that meeting attendees "insisted that the Lodzer Centre's small size (275 families) and its connection to the Holocaust (the synagogue was built by survivors from Lodz, Poland) must be preserved so that 'we will never forget' this important aspect of our Jewish heritage.

"The members' consensus was to continue building on their strengths" including a growing young families group that holds child-friendly Shabbat services twice a month, the release said.

Lodzer members want to stay independent

Although there was no formal vote at the meeting, which was attended by about 120 people, the merger committee felt there was no point pursuing the option, given the degree of opposition among members, Hazan told The C.J.N.

Members are "passionate that [the Lodzer] is a monument to the memory of their families," she said.

"They want that building, those bricks, those windows, just the way they are."

"The good thing that came out of the process was a shaking up of things and a commitment to make our shul work," she said. As a result of the meeting, she added, new people have joined committees in "key areas" including fundraising, programming, marketing and financial.

"That's going to make a big difference."

In a November letter to congregants, which outlined reasons for considering the merger, Hazan wrote that the shul's building, located on Heaton Street near Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue, needs repairs and expansion to accommodate more of the programs that the synagogue would like to offer.

As well, she wrote at the time, the costs of paying the rabbi, cantor, ba'al koreh and a leader for the congregation's young family service are higher than the synagogue's income from dues, High Holy Day tickets and fundraising.

Both synagogues are unaffiliated, but have services that are Conservative in style. The Lodzer Centre is egalitarian, while Pride of Israel is more traditional.

Joe Goldstein, Pride of Israel's chairman of the board, said that it's "business as usual" at his 450-member synagogue following the news.

"We are always open to negotiations with any organization that approaches us regarding a merger," he added.

The shul, an outgrowth of a sick benefit society established in 1905, has seen its membership decline significantly over the past few decades. In 1999, there were 750 families. It has been at its current building on Bathurst north of Steeles Avenue since 1968.

Hamas scores PR victory amid Gazan misery

Recent events in Gaza were played out front and centre in the international media. The focus was mainly on the downtrodden Palestinians, although the security threats to Israel were given at least some coverage.

On Jan. 23, the barrier separating Gaza from Egypt fell (after a well-planned demolition by Hamas), and thousands of Gazans jubilantly crossed the border.

As Kevin Peraino wrote in "The PR War in Gaza," (Jan. 23 Newsweek.com): "It's hard to imagine a more vivid postcard of Palestinian deprivation than the scene this morning at the sun-bleached crossing between Egypt and the Gaza Strip."

Peraino noted: "Over the last few weeks, the Islamists have looked much more adept at playing the public-relations game, using powerful television images to stoke international sympathies."

Similarly, in "Hamas exposes Israeli weakness in Gaza," Jan. 23, Reuters reporter Adam Entous wrote: "Hamas has exposed Israel's inability to rein in the Gaza Strip, proving it holds the power to blow open the border and turn a crippling Israeli blockade into a public relations nightmare for the Jewish state."

Many Israeli analysts concurred. For example, in "The real Gaza disengagement" (Ynetnews, Jan. 24), Alex Fishman remarked: "Hamas not only broke through the economic and diplomatic siege, it also scored international points and forced pro-western Arab regimes to show solidarity [with it]... Yesterday, it was Egypt's turn to fall into the trap laid by one of the most sophisticated productions ever seen in the Middle East: Hamas wrote, directed, and produced it in conjunction with the Muslim Brotherhood and their main channel – al-Jazeera. The target audience: The Arab world, Israel, the United Nations and Europe."

Fishman went on to argue that the Gaza breach was not just another public relations setback for Israel, but also the beginning of a new dynamic in which Egypt will have to assume more responsibility for Gaza – something Israelis are skeptical of given Egypt's very poor record of preventing heavy arms smuggling into Gaza.

Prior to the border breach, Israel had imposed a blockade on Gaza in response to an unceasing barrage of rocket fire on Israel's southern communities.

Most media outlets ran pictures of Palestinian civilians – with a special focus on children – in Gaza City carrying candles to provide light in the night darkened by Israel's withholding fuel to the city's electricity-generating station.

Often minimized was the fact that although Israel supplies 70 per cent of Gaza's electricity, it did not cut back on all of it, and there was still power in the rest of Gaza. Despite this, the drama provided the perfect backdrop for the European Union and humanitarian organizations to accuse Israel of "collective punishment."

Nevertheless, the Globe and Mail Jan. 22 editorial, "Blame it on Hamas," captured the cynical nature of Hamas' policy. It argued that Israel's "gesture" of easing the sanctions would not "in any way encourage Hamas to order its thugs to rein in their attacks on civilian targets in Israel."

The paper wrote: "The villains in the tawdry drama being played out at the expense of the impoverished and downtrodden Gazans should be obvious. But in case it's not, here's a hint: It's not Israel."

The Globe noted that Israel was trying to find a non-lethal way to pressure Hamas to stop the rocket fire, but had to incur the wrath of the United Nations and other organizations that condemned the blockade.

The editorial quoted Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni: "Israel is the only country in the world that supplies electricity to terror groups which in turn fire rockets at it."

Also, many TV news reports showed Qassams being fired so that viewers could understand the plight of Israeli civilians. In a Jan. 22 report (shown on NewsWorld) the BBC ran an interview with an Israeli woman living in the path of the Qassams, who said: "Two days without electricity? It's not so bad. It's a very passive way of saying to Gaza, to Hamas, this has to stop. There has to be a way of stopping it, and I think that instead of [Israel] throwing bombs on Gaza, stopping electricity is a very humanitarian way of saying, 'Stop the rockets!'"

Why YOU should care about ISRAEL APARTHEID WEEK

Poster promoting ISRAEL APARTHEID WEEK at the University of Toronto depicting Israel as a police state comparable to South Africa.

- Three years ago the Arab Students' Collective staged the first ISRAEL APARTHEID WEEK at the University of Toronto.
- This is part of a coordinated global campaign to label Israel and the very idea of a Jewish state as criminal.
- Next month, the fourth ISRAEL APARTHEID WEEK is being staged on Canadian campuses. It is now endorsed by 13 student groups.

The atmosphere of intimidation on campuses is real.

Why has our Jewish leadership let us down?

- Some individuals did speak out but our Toronto Jewish leadership wrote:

"We will not encourage the university to shut down 'Israeli Apartheid Week' activities..."

"Under no circumstances would we approach the administration about canceling this week's events..."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency
Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising
reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

What the slave can teach us

By RABBI AVRAM ROTHMAN

Parshat Mishpatim, which we are reading this week, has among its many thought-provoking ideas one that I find particularly odd, but also poignantly important in these times.

The parashah tells us that at the end of six years of work, a man who has acquired a Jewish slave – as a way, for example, for the slave to pay restitution for a theft – must allow the slave to go free. However, if the slave indicates that he would prefer to remain a slave, even after his debt and time have been served, he may do so with the enactment of a very odd ritual. The master is required to take an awl and use it to bore a hole through the ear of the slave while standing against the doorpost of the home.

Rashi, apparently bothered by this ritual, asks what the significance is of such an odd action? What is the message in drilling a hole into a person's ear that has some relevance to being a slave?

Rashi answers the question by quoting from the Talmud: "The ear that heard on Sinai 'You are to be slaves to Me' and nevertheless chose to sell himself into slavery (acquiring a different master for himself) and then chose to remain in servitude when he had the opportunity to go free is deserving of punishment."

Well, that's all well and good, but I certainly have a problem with this. It was not his ear that was at fault, but his brain.

The ear is a receptacle for hearing sound, but it's his brain that did not actualize what he heard. The ear did its job, while the brain, clearly, did not. Perhaps they should have punched a hole in his brain, rather than his ear, since the slave certainly heard what had been said at Mount Sinai, but he simply didn't allow it to enter into his brain!

The answer is, in fact, it's the ear's fault, because the message remained only in the ear. The trouble with this person is that he heard, externally, but he did not listen. He didn't internalize the message of, "They shall be slaves to Me; not slaves to other slaves." That was his sin. The message remained only in the ear. It literally went in one ear and out the other.

How clearly we see this in today's TV-watching, moviegoing and sports-following society. We in many ways have become a society of spectators, even in relation to our own lives. We don't allow messages to enter our psyche, but rather we let them sit, externally, in our ear, not entering our brain.

We watch life, even our own lives, and believe that there's nothing we can do to change. We are what we are. But in reality, if we only allow the messages of the Torah, our Jewish tradition, to enter from our ear into our consciousness, we will be able to free ourselves from our own bonds of slavery, slavery to what we allow ourselves to remain as, rather than who we can become.

Taking the Torah's messages from our ear and bringing it into our brain – that is, truly listening to the message, not just passively hearing it – teaches us that we can become as great, as good and as spiritual as we want to be, and become the person we truly want to become.

Rabbi Avram Rothman is spiritual leader of the Thornhill Community Shul in Thornhill, Ont.

Holding tight with open arms

Parents' weekend at my son's university convinced me of one thing: I am definitely not as old as those other parents.

They look old enough to be my parents. They look so uncool, so parental.

At one point, however, I saw my son looking at me looking at him, and it hit me like a brick: through my son's eyes, I definitely looked as old as those other parents. This was made even harder because my son goes to my alma mater, and I kept thinking it was me and my friends in the library, me and my friends in the cafeteria, me and my friends in the dorm – but actually it's me and my friends who will be at our 30th reunion this June.

That's the truth, and hey, it hurts a bit.

When we send our kids off to college we send ourselves off, too, in a sense. Just as the bar mitzvah represents a rite of passage for the whole family – changing the family dynamic and reminding us that we don't have a "baby" anymore – so, too, does sending the first child off to university hold up a mirror of aging to both us and our kid.

They have to learn that they, too, are growing older. They must budget their time and their money, develop their own serious relationships – though we may not always be thrilled with the people they choose – and determine their own Jewish life, observances and attitudes. This may be exciting for them, but boy is it scary for us.

Watching my son at university, I felt exactly the same way I felt on his first day of junior kindergarten: utterly proud and utterly lost. How do I relate to this kid who is no longer a baby? How do I relate to this boy who is now a man?

The two most important things I think I've given my son are roots and wings.

When it comes to roots, parents of young children should prepare now so that they feel confident that their child is firmly rooted in their family and in Judaism when she/he goes off in the future.

And when it comes to wings, we should recall the story of a man who once found the cocoon of a butterfly with a small opening. He watched the butterfly as it struggled to force its body through that little hole, but it seemed to stop making any progress. He decided to help it. He took a pair of scissors and snipped off the remaining cocoon. The butterfly emerged with a swollen body and small, shrivelled wings. It was never able to fly.

In his kindness, the man did not understand that the struggle required for the butterfly to get through the tiny opening was God's way of forcing fluid from its body into its wings so that it would be ready for flight. It couldn't be helped to do this.

Likewise, parents must be careful not to help so much that their kids cannot endure a struggle. The late Rabbi Milton Steinberg called this "holding tight with open arms."

All during parents' weekend, I felt the blending of love and loss that defines parenthood. And so did all those other old, uncool parents just like me.

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi
Elyse

Jewish Life

Long gone are the days when teachers were those who could find no other employment. Thank God our Jewish schools have many talented teachers who could be successful in a host of other professions that offer higher salaries. Yet The CJN (Jan. 17) reported that suggestions have been made that "options for lowering the cost of education include decreasing teacher salaries."

Emotions aside, it behooves us to examine the perspective of Jewish law on this issue.

Jewish law prohibits receiving compensation for the performance of mitzvot. Torah observance links man to the Divine: "The same way I [God] [taught Torah] for free, so too you [are to teach for] free" (Bechorot 29a). Interestingly, a similar issue exists regarding doctors who perform the vital tasks of tending to our physical health.

While such a volunteer system may have been viable when parents were the main teachers of Torah (and as a result, sadly, most Jews remained ignorant), clearly it's impossible to expect those who dedicate their lives to teaching (or healing) to do so for free.

The Talmud (Ketuvot 105a) records that judges were to be compensated from public funds. Noting that a judge who accepts payment for his judgments renders those judgments null and void, the Talmud asserts that payment is not actually given for rendering judgment but as shekar batala, what we today call opportunity cost.

By eschewing other forms of employment and making themselves available to serve the public, they have no other means of support and thus must be compensated from the public treasury, much as civil servants are today. That the public and not the litigants themselves compensate the judges has the added benefit of justice having no direct correlation to income, something that is, sadly, not always the case today. Since public servants are being paid out of public, and thus charitable, funds, following the principles of tzedakah, they would be paid, the Talmud notes, according to need. Those with larger families would receive greater levels of compensation (a big baby bonus).

The concept of paying public servants according to a charity scale does not resonate well in our egalitarian culture (and might very well be illegal in Canada). Equal pay for equal work irrespective of personal circumstances is the way our marketplace operates (in theory). In any event, such a need-based payment scale only applies to those who are permanently on call for public service and thus have no opportunity for other employment.

Whether such a salary system would apply even in theory to modern-day, full-time teachers is quite debatable. For better or worse, teachers are often expected to seek other employment to make ends meet, yet no doubt a teaching schedule severely limits their options. (It's worth noting that Jewish law generally prohibits moonlighting, recognizing that it would impair a person's ability to properly perform his or her regular job.)

Nonetheless, all who engage in teaching Torah, whether part time or full time, are entitled to payment in lieu of wages that they could have earned elsewhere. Calculating such an amount is no simple matter. Does it mean paying them what they could actually earn in practice, which might be very little, or what they theoretically could have earned, which could mean six- or even seven-figure salaries?

Public service salaries, including those of teachers, are not, and perhaps should not be, able to compete with those in the private sector. Yet by not offering salaries that are at least in the same ballpark, we lose many people who would contribute greatly to the Jewish community. And for that we are all the poorer.

In a couple of weeks, Israelis will take centre court as Israel hosts Sweden in the first round of one of tennis's premier events, the Davis Cup.

Last fall, all eyes were on Dudi Sela as he faced world No. 6 Fernando Gonzalez. As the Jerusalem Post put it, "In what is arguably the greatest tennis match to be played in Israel, Sela, who was then ranked 99 places below his Chilean opponent, defeated Gonzalez 4-6, 7-6 (5), 5-7, 7-6 (7), 6-3 in a five-hour-long David versus Goliath match-up... Neither Sela nor Israeli sport would ever be the same afterward." [tinyurl.com/zuhtw5]

A little over the top? Not when you watch the crowd explode after Sela's historic match point. [tinyurl.com/2644v4] And thanks to that win, in a couple of weeks, Israel will play host to Sweden in the first round of the 2008 Davis Cup World Group. In honour of that upcoming meet, let's look at some of Israel's tennis greats.

Israelis – and Jews in general – have had a strong association with the game. Wikipedia lists 50 Jewish players [tinyurl.com/yuxxmt] and JewishSports.org profiles more than 50 more. [tinyurl.com/2znev] A current note of note is Shahar Peer, who is ranked 17 in WTA standings and will represent Israel this week in the Fed Cup against defending champion Russia. [tinyurl.com/29d4p92] I found a lovely clip on YouTube of Peer talking about career and playing tennis with some kids in New York City. [tinyurl.com/2envev] You can watch her in action as she wins the Istanbul Tennis Cup. [tinyurl.com/2zhpsp]

The Jewish Highway

Another bright light is Anna Smashnova. JewishSports says "Smashnova not only has one of the great names in the history of tennis, she is also Israel's top female tennis player." Smashnova has been in 13 finals and has won 12 of them. [tinyurl.com/2f76e7]

Looking back into the record books, two of Israel's most famous players are Amos Mansdorf and Shlomo Glickstein. Glickstein is Israel's all-time leader in total wins, singles wins (31), and doubles wins (13). One of the highlights in his career came in November 1979, when "Glickstein managed to stretch John McEnroe to three sets in the first round of the Stockholm Grand Prix after losing the first set 6-0 in five minutes. "Shlomo realized," noted [coach Ron] Steele, "that the giants of the game were only human." Glickstein learned that aggressiveness pays off." [tinyurl.com/3xyub6]

Amos Mansdorf reached an all-time career high of 18th rank in the WTA and defeated such top players as Wimbledon champion Michael Stich and then-fourth-ranked Boris Becker in other tournaments. [tinyurl.com/37hx3h] The late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin once said that Mansdorf was the person he most admired. [tinyurl.com/yuvxps]

Many of Israel's tennis superstars got their start at the Israeli Tennis Center. According to its site, the centre operates the largest children's tennis program in the world "changing the lives of more than 350,000 families, five per cent of the population."

There are 14 centres in the country from Kiryat Shmona to Arad. [tinyurl.com/3cm2jp] For the latest tennis news in Hebrew, check out One.co.il, [tinyurl.com/2bxtvx] as well as the Israel Tennis Association's Hebrew-only site. [ita.one.co.il]

When Israel takes to the court on Feb. 8, it will be the country's first appearance in the Davis Cup since 1994. But Israel's association with the competition goes all the way back to the early months of the state when Israel played Denmark in April 1949. Its best Davis Cup performance came in 1987 when it reached the quarterfinals. In order to claim the cup this time, Israel must advance to the quarterfinals in April, the semifinals in September and the finals in November. [tinyurl.com/3x22yb]

That may sound daunting, but the Jerusalem Post is excited about Israel's chances. In a recent overview of the sport, it proclaimed that with athletes such as Sela and Peer, "The 2008 season promises to be one of Israeli tennis's greatest ever." [tinyurl.com/3ezuum]

Whenever I write my columns, I try to find some connection between the topic at hand and Judaism. This week is no different. So let me leave you with these words. [tinyurl.com/23p6c3]

Q: How do we know that tennis is mentioned in the Bible?

A: "And Joseph served in Pharaoh's court."

Fraser Institute offers tuition grants to needy families

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Children First: School Choice Trust – a program of the Fraser Institute, a conservative think tank – is in its sixth year of offering grants to low-income families for tuition at private schools, including religious schools.

The program, which began in 2003, covers half the cost of tuition, at any Ontario private school that is registered with the provincial ministry of education, up to a maximum of $4,000.

They are available as early as junior kindergarten and are renewable until students complete Grade 8, subject to funding availability.

In Ontario, the program, which is funded by the W. Garfield Weston Foundation, supports about 1,000 children at more than 200 private schools. Recipients include 57 students at 13 different Jewish schools, mostly in the Toronto area, according to Michael Thomas, director of the program.

Jewish day school tuition in the Toronto area ranges from about $10,500 to more than $14,000 per year in the elementary grades.

There are also two students receiving grants at Jewish schools in Calgary, where the program was instituted more recently.

Other sources of funding – such as subsidies or family support – for the remaining portion of tuition do not affect eligibility, said Thomas.

If grantees remain eligible for the program, they are allowed to renew their grant every year until Grade 8. That means there are about 300 openings for new grantees in Ontario, Thomas said.

Sometimes students leave the program if they move out of province or transfer to the public school system, he noted.

Family income is the sole deciding factor for grant eligibility, although with many more applicants than available money, new grants are awarded based on a lottery.

To qualify, household income "must not exceed amounts equal to twice the poverty line as defined by the [Fraser Institute's] Basic Needs Index," to the program's website says.

More specifically, for a family of four to qualify for the coming school year, 2007 income would have to be less than $52,817. Likewise, for a family of three, $45,469; two people $37,411, five people, $59,653; and six or more in the household $66,091.

Thomas noted that some parents have come up with "really creative solutions" to pay for the portion of tuition not covered by the grant. He recalled two cases (not at Jewish schools) in which parents worked on a volunteer basis at their children's schools in exchange for tuition credit.

"Children First helps families who have different needs, whether it's a desire for smaller class sizes to help their kids catch up, developing artistic talents, or just wanting a safe school that teaches values important to the family," Thomas said in a news release.

The impetus for the program, Thomas said, was research conducted by Claudia Hepburn, the institute's director of education policy, on student performance when parents have greater choice of schools.

Among its findings were improved student literacy and improvement in performance of public schools, Thomas said.

Although many scholarships exist for post-secondary education, the Children First program was the first of its kind in Canada and is the only one of its kind in Ontario, said Thomas.

He followed with interest last fall's provincial election, when funding of faith-based schools was a key issue, but "because we're a registered charity, we remain non-partisan and don't take positions on those kinds of debates."

However, he added, "certainly there would have been a benefit to many of our families [if government funding of faith-based schools had been implemented], and it would have allowed us to help more families attending other schools." He noted that approximately 75 per cent of Ontario's 800 private schools are faith-based.

Grant applications are available online at www.childrenfirst-grants.ca. Applications can also be submitted by registered mail or by calling 1-866-924-8881.

Teacher brings the outdoors to school

Harry Shuber is a whitewater canoeist, sea kayaker and expedition guide who plays hockey twice a week.

He is a fan of the Red Hot Chili Peppers and has played electric bass in bands at Toronto clubs since he was a high school student at the Toronto French School in the early 1990s.

"They are our teachers..."

But Mr. Shuber, as his students call him, maintains a certain formality in his Grade 7 and 8 classroom at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School.

Neatly dressed, with a patterned tie complementing his black shirt – typical attire, he says – Shuber, who is also the school's middle school curriculum development co-ordinator, said in an interview last week that he believes a "visible difference" between students and teacher makes the students feel more at ease.

But he added that regardless of what a teacher is wearing, "kids realize if there's substance or not."

The 32-year-old Toronto native brings an eclectic background to the classroom. Before

A lesson from the teacher:

"The most important thing is believing deep down that you really can positively impact whatever situation you happen to find yourself in."

completing his bachelor of education degree at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education of the University of Toronto, he received a BA in history from U of T and a post-graduate certificate from Humber College's eco and adventure tourism program. He also spent a year studying for a bachelor of music degree at McGill University, majoring in jazz performance.

With a resumé that includes tutoring, coaching basketball, and working at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, Shuber said that pursuing a teaching career was always something that interested him.

After a five-year-stint at Arlington Middle School, Shuber joined Paul Penna's brand new middle school in 2006 as curriculum development co-ordinator and a teacher of core subjects, including math, social studies and language arts.

Last June, he led the school's first annual canoe expedition to Algonquin Provincial Park.

Thematic study units during the year build toward the trip. A map of the park hangs on his classroom wall, and numerous thriving plants represent Shuber's attempt to "bring nature in."

Several times during the interview, he mentioned the importance of developing critical thought in students – "having them question, question, question," he said.

However, he added, they have to do the work necessary to be able to question. "You want them to be engaged and move along the passive-to-active continuum."

Shuber – who said he is "incredibly excited about" his work – believes that spontaneity, humour, respect, dealing with situations that arise, and "keeping young people on the edge of their seats" so that they want to know what is next are all important aspects of teaching.

As a teacher, he said, "you've got to be incredibly well prepared... All of what you'd like to see in a student, you should see in yourself."

Brain injury survivors display courage day after day

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Courage isn't always about fighting fires and saving lives. Sometimes, the simple act of living day to day is the truer mark of valour.

That's what a high-powered Toronto audience of nearly 150 people learned last week at the city's fourth annual Hawaiian Oyster Odyssey fundraiser, held at a mid-town restaurant in support of the Brain Injury Society of Toronto (BIST) and the Brain Injury Association of Canada (BIAC).

Howard Brown, a founding director of the national charity – his cousin, Steven Sieber, succumbed to a traumatic brain injury in 2001 at age 46 after being hit by a car in 1977 – is also the voluntary fundraising chair of the association and the inspiration behind the yearly event.

"This is the height of [tikun olam] in action," Brown told The C/N. "There are many support organizations out there already for other causes, but we're bringing awareness to a community who need our help and our advocacy. My cousin is no longer here, but what better way to honour his memory than this fundraiser?"

As for why organizers chose a "Hawaiian Oyster" theme, oysters contain zinc, a mineral thought to help the brain maintain "peak performance." The Hawaiian theme reflects the most coveted prize of the event's annual silent auction – a pair of tickets to Hawaii courtesy of Air Canada.

Guests were bedecked with leis and treated to 1950s surf music, as well as an oyster-shucking contest and Hawaiian punch. They were encouraged to bid lavishly on items in the silent auction to benefit the two organizations.

But most importantly, attendees heard from the evening's VIPs, as one by one, the gala's hosts – all young survivors of brain injuries – stood up to recount their life-altering stories and appeal for financial aid in order to increase awareness of this debilitating condition.

According to BIAC, more than 50,000 Canadians sustain brain injuries every year, which are the "number 1 killer and disabler of people under 45."

Symptoms of brain injury include loss of emotional control, memory loss, impaired reasoning skills, speech impairment, nausea, confusion, chronic headaches and various cognitive impairments. And every sufferer manifests their symptoms uniquely, making brain injury difficult to treat and diagnose.

The worst part for many is the realization of what they've lost and seeing that reflected in the eyes of their friends and families. The crushing depression that can follow – as their old, vibrant selves are replaced by an unrecognizable, altered version – is common among survivors.

Megan Patterson, past-president of BIST, who breathes using a tracheostomy tube, recalled her injury to The C/N. "I was in a coma for two weeks after my car accident," Howard Brown and Ontario Health Minister George Smitherman share a smile at the Brain Injury Association of Canada fundraiser in Toronto.

she said. "It's 11 years later, and I'm getting through it with the amazing support of my family and friends. I now volunteer to help make things easier for other victims. But I wish I'd had someone who would've helped mentor me through this earlier on."

Patterson, 31, hopes to address this need by rolling out a program of brain injury peer mentoring with BIST later this year.

Danny Betts, 31, another BIST volunteer, had his life changed in an instant.

"At 29, I slid off a motorcycle 40 feet into a [parked car] and was diagnosed with severe traumatic brain injury," he recalled with stilted speech and a sad look on his face. "Since then, my perception of reality has changed. Most days, I can't remember what I ate for breakfast [or] if I even had breakfast. I was once an up-and-comer. Now, I'm having a very hard time."

Also in attendance was Sarah Briggs, 33, a former member of the national ski team. In 1994, at 19, Briggs endured a catastrophic wipe-out on the slopes of Mont Ste. Anne in Quebec and had a bright future almost completely snuffed out.

"My face took the full impact of the fall, and then I slid face-first down nearly 30 feet of slope. I had 11 hours of reconstructive surgery, spent 13 days in the hospital. Most of the time, I feel very lucky to be alive," Briggs said. "Afterwards, I thought my life would go back to normal. Nothing was further from the truth. I've had [electro-convulsive therapy], suffered depression, had a psychotic episode... and had to withdraw from my teaching work. I was crushed."

But Briggs vowed to the audience that she is still fighting to get her life back.

"I'm discovering there are many things I can still do. This is my focus now instead of [focusing] on all the things I was told I could not do," she said.

According to Brown, last week's Toronto fundraiser brought in nearly $100,000, and since 2005, similar BIAC events have raised more than $500,000 in communities across Canada.

BIAC's Oyster Odyssey campaign started with one event in 2005 and this year features 10 galas scheduled for major urban centres coast to coast. Each will benefit the local community's brain injury society.

Brown and his wife, Kim Cohen – who together run Toronto PR firm Brown & Cohen Communications & Public Affairs Inc. – have used both their personal and business contacts to attract big-name donors and supporters to the events.

On hand to express their support were numerous politicians, businesspeople and philanthropists, including Ontario Minister of Education Kathleen Wynne, Minister of Health and Long Term Care George Smitherman, Willowdale MPP David Zimmer, MP Carolyn Bennett and former Toronto mayor David Crombie.

"There's a humbling [feeling] that this could be any one of us," Bennett said after listening to Briggs' story. "As a family doctor, I remember knowing patients before their injury and then watching the courage they had to get through afterwards."

Said Brown: "We have two objectives. To build community and show brain injury survivors that their voice is heard," he said. "That's why it's important that [politicians] get to hear their stories first-hand."

Cohen concurred, adding: "At the end of the day, you take satisfaction from all the people and sponsors who made donations to help people who are not otherwise helped."

New project will send bikes to Israel for kids in need

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Just for fun last year, 54-year-old transplanted Montrealer Yehoshua Wolman decided to take a course in bicycle mechanics and repair given by the Toronto District School Board.

When he learned that his teacher overhauled and refurbished bikes and sent them to Cuba and Africa, he decided "let me do something for my people too."

He has established an organization called bicycles4israel, which aims to take used bikes, fix them up if needed, and ship them to Israel. He intends to raise funds to pay for the shipping.

In Israel, Wolman said, many people use bikes to get from one place to another. "They are not just a luxury."

"I will take any bike – kids' bikes, street bikes, women's and men's." Even if the bikes can't be salvaged, he said, he can sometimes use the parts.

Wolman said he can also use lights, mirrors, helmets, water bottles for bicycles, and their cages, horns and bells. He will even have the bikes or accessories picked up.

Once the bicycles are refurbished, he will send them to Israel. An individual from the Israeli Cycling Federation will distribute them to needy children.

Wolman said one thing he needs now is to find storage and working space. At the moment, he has 10 or 15 bikes in a friend's garage and some on his balcony.

"But a balcony isn't very good in the winter," he said dryly. To contact Wolman, call 416-689-7200 or e-mail bicycles4israel@gmail.com.

75 years since Hitler came to power

By ALEK SILVER

"Black January" is the term used by historians to describe the infamous day in January 1933 when Adolf Hitler and his Nazi party came to power in Germany – and not through a coup or a revolution.

The Nazi party nominated more candidates than any other political party for the 1933 election. The nomination of Adolf Hitler came from the almost senile German president, Field Marshall Paul von Hindenburg, who, by all accounts, did not realize the fatal mistake he was making and the tragedy he was bringing to the world by giving Hitler the opportunity to ascend to the highest position in the country. And the rest, as the saying goes, is history.

Hindenburg's political advisers, who urged him to nominate Hitler, miscalculated. They thought that they would be able to tame and control the "wild beast" by giving him the power to lead his nation.

The beast, however, would not allow anybody to tame him. On the contrary, once he became Germany's chancellor, he became more bloodthirsty, venom-spitting and power-hungry with every day, killing anybody who stood in his way.

There are still people alive today who remember the large headlines "screaming off" the front pages of the newspapers on Jan. 30, 1933, when it was announced in the Bundestag (parliament) that Hitler had been elected chancellor of the Third Reich.

Not all nations condemned the election results. Those countries that had fascist regimes and histories of anti-Semitism welcomed Hitler to power, not realizing that the long arm of the beast would also reach them. But one thing was realized at the time: world politics had changed.

The truth is that the parliamentary system in Germany dissolved after 1930. Although presenting a democratic face to the world, Germany was ruled by a dictatorial regime with secret laws.

In the early 1930s, the world was in a crisis, with unemployment rampant. After Germany's defeat in World War I, the German masses were suffering under the consequences of the Treaty of Versailles, and feeling the shame that came with the country's problems. Crooked German politicians looked after their own interests, rather than the welfare of the people. The German people were docile, however, giving credence to the demagogic slogans of their politicians. The nation was looking for a scapegoat for their woes.

In this atmosphere, Hitler came to power. Millions of Germans erupted in jubilation the day Hitler became chancellor of Germany. They marched in the streets, singing anti-Semitic songs to military bands. They were led by uniformed Nazi ruffians with swastikas on their sleeves, flaming torches in their outstretched fists and shouting "Heil Hitler." The mass demonstrations were initiated and staged by the notorious Dr. Josef Goebbels, who later became the Nazi propaganda minister.

Hitler gave the German people what they wanted most of all – a scapegoat. He laid at their feet a "sacrifice" in the form of the Jewish nation.

Hitler's plans to annihilate the Jewish race had not been kept secret. He had written about those plans in detail in his manifesto, Mein Kampf. He also wrote about his plans for enslaving the Slavic nations of Europe to give his countrymen more lebensraum, living space. Hitler's plans were for a large Germany under the slogan, "Today Germany, tomorrow the whole world."

Looking back 75 years, it is now very clear that the election of Hitler as chancellor of Germany brought about the most horrible tragedy in world history. The tragedy was for his own country, for the world – and most of all – for the Jewish nation that lost more than six million people. Unfortunately, the Nazi and anti-Semitic ideologies are not yet extinguished, and Jews around the world, as well as world leaders, must stand on constant guard against them.

Orthodox gay rabbi speaks about religion, homosexuality

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Steve Greenberg, the first openly gay Orthodox rabbi, was in Toronto last week to discuss the conflict between homosexuality and Judaism and to offer a "poetic" way to interpret the biblical texts that are understood to condemn same-sex relationships.

His lecture, titled "Gayness and God," at the Wolfson Centre for Jewish Campus Life, sponsored by groups including Hillel and Kulanu Toronto, was attended by more than 100 people on Jan. 22. He is a senior teaching fellow at a think-tank called the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership.

Before delving into the different ways the verse in Leviticus – which states: "a man shall not lie with another man as with a woman; it is an abomination" – can be interpreted, Rabbi Greenberg shared his story about his introduction to Orthodoxy.

Coming from a Conservative family in Columbus, Ohio, it wasn't until he went to a Shabbat service at an Orthodox shul and met an elderly rabbi that he realized Judaism was so important to him.

The rabbi offered Rabbi Greenberg, who was 15 at the time, and three of his friends, the opportunity to study Torah with him each Shabbat morning. He later began to go to shul each morning to dawn.

"I became Orthodox because this world was so precious to me," he said.

Two years later, he enrolled in a yeshiva in Gush Etzion, near Jerusalem.

While in school, he found himself attracted to a fellow yeshiva student. Struggling internally with his feelings, he sought the advice of Rabbi Yosef Shalom Eliashiv, a posek in Jerusalem, one of the most respected arbiters of Jewish law in Israel.

Rabbi Greenberg, who hadn't had any physical relationships with women at that point, said to him, "I'm attracted to both men and women. What should I do?"

Rabbi Eliashiv responded, "You have twice the power of love. Use it carefully."

Rabbi Greenberg said he felt like an enormous weight had been lifted off his shoulders.

"Had I said, 'Can I have a boyfriend?' I'm sure the answer would have been no. I don't want to make it seem like he was permitting anything. He understood that he needed to tell me that my inner life was not ugly. That's what I needed to hear, and that is exactly what he told me."

He said that in the years that followed, he moved to New York and dated women, which became increasingly difficult for him.

In 1983, he was ordained as a rabbi and every year on Yom Kippur, when he read the verse in Leviticus that said that a man lying with a man is an abomination, his heart would break.

"Every year, for nine years, I would sit in the corner of the synagogue... I'd put my talit over my head and I would weep."

He said in the 10th year, he was out of tears and decided that he wanted to get an aliyah to the Torah during the reading of that verse. When he was called to the Torah and the verse was read, a calm came over him that was completely unexpected.

"It is totally out of the blue, and it dawns on me that my willingness to be vulnerable to the text requires it to be vulnerable to me and to everybody else... Whoever reads that text – if they haven't heard my story, our stories, the thousands upon thousands of stories, the people who live every day with that verse around their neck, crushing their spirits and their thoughts, and their hearts – then they don't know what the verse means... How could they know what it means?"

He said it was then that he realized that it was his responsibility to go to Israel, study the Torah and figure out what the verse means.

What he learned, he outlined in his book, Wrestling with God and Men: Homosexuality in the Jewish Tradition. He said that it is not a halachic response, but a poetic one.

Rabbi Greenberg presented a list of rationales for the prohibition in Leviticus.

Among the rationales, the argument that the idea that Jews should only have sex for the purpose of reproduction, is not legitimate.

"You still have the obligation of reproduction, but the sex act of itself does not need to be reproductive. It needs to be relational, connected... So to claim that the Torah prohibits sex between men because it isn't reproductive, can't make a great deal of sense."

The second rationale is based on a story in the Gemarah that explains that homosexuality could cause a man to stray from his wife.

"Homosexuality is a problem because married men wander from their marital bed to fool around with men... The reason is because we force everyone to marry. When you have a rule that every one marries, somebody is going to marry a kid who is gay or lesbian and their lives are going to be really hard. And then people will either suffer, cheat on their spouses... So the solution to that problem is... don't force gay people into marriages."

Rabbi Greenberg also argued that the verse is more misogynistic than homophobic.

He said that in biblical times, to punish and humiliate a man was to "penetrate him like a woman."

Rabbi collaborated on film on Orthodox gay Jews

Women were beneath men in value and power and so sex is associated as an act of humiliation, he said.

"The best way to humiliate a man is to insinuate that he was taken by another man... That is how the verse in Leviticus can be framed - do not have sex with another man if it humiliates and debases him."

He said that by viewing homosexual sex within a different frame "it opens up the imagination that sex between men is loving, committed, generous, and just has nothing to do with that abomination."

During the question-and-answer period, an audience member asked Rabbi Greenberg about his thoughts on gay observant Jews who choose to be celibate.

"I am not against a person deciding that celibacy is the most appropriate way to go. I just don't think it can be demanded on someone. The rabbis understand that a man who isn't married is poverty stricken. He is considered an ani. Why? Because to be without a partner for love, intimacy and companionship is to really be poor... Given the Jewish understanding of what it means to be partnered and in a relationship and how central that is for Jews, I don't think that it would be something the tradition could reasonably demand."

Rabbi Greenberg, who collaborated on the film, Trembling Before God, a documentary about Orthodox gay Jews, said he hopes that his interpretations could provide a way for gay people to read the verse and still feel like they belong to the Jewish community and are embraced by God.

He said that Orthodox rabbis don't have to agree with his rationale, but Orthodox synagogues should adhere to three principles that would make observant gay Jews feel more welcome.

First, a rabbi should never speak in humiliating ways about homosexuality in the pulpit.

Second, gay people shouldn't expect an Orthodox congregation to rally behind them as social and political allies.

"The reason is because the Halachah isn't there yet, but it is also because it took me 15 years to get where I am and I'm not going to go to some straight fellow in an Orthodox synagogue and say, 'Right now, you've got to accept everything that I accept about myself...' I'm a member of the shul, not for political liberation. I'm a member of the shul to be part of a sacred community."

Last, a gay person should never feel like they have to lie about who they are.

"We have been obligated to shame ourselves, and it's causing incredible damage to not be real about who we are... We get to be real, the way that every one else is real. We get to be human in shul. Not lying, not demanding advocacy, but real."

Rabbi Greenberg came out of the closet in 1999, the same year that he helped found Jerusalem Open House, Jerusalem's first gay and lesbian community centre, where he serves as the educational adviser.

McGill Hillel helps form anti-hate coalition

By EZRA GLINTER

Special to The C/JN

MONTREAL — Thanks to Hillel McGill, dozens of campus groups are now working together to fight racism and other forms of hatred.

Launched on Jan. 21, the Student Coalition Against Hate includes 26 student groups including Queer McGill, the Black Students Network and Amnesty McGill.

Spearheaded by Hillel, the coalition aims to combat hatred and prejudice by using the combined strength of its membership to promote lectures and other events.

"Each club on campus stands for something very worthwhile, but separately we only appeal to a certain number of people. Together we have a much stronger and louder voice to speak with," said Eric Goldberg, president of Hillel McGill and founder of the Coalition Against Hate.

"The initiative was to find like-minded clubs to join with Hillel and to speak out about these very universal issues."

Ariel Pulver, the coalition's president and Hillel's social outreach co-ordinator, also stressed the benefits of broad co-operation among student groups.

"There are all these groups - McGill's a pretty active campus - but attendance at events is often small and limited to people who are already interested. By creating this network and cross-promoting each other's events, we can ensure a broader platform," she said.

Pulver said the coalition also creates an opportunity for Hillel to work more closely with other student organizations.

"We're trying to do something big and inclusive to form positive relationships with other student groups and to foster a positive atmosphere on campus," she said.

The launch featured a talk by Frank Chalk, a professor of history at Concordia University and the head of the Montreal Institute for Genocide and Human Rights Studies.

Although the coalition is currently unique to McGill, it plans to help set up similar organizations on other university campuses.

New Israel tour offers young Jews a chance to reconnect, Part 2

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's not hard to have a good time on a 10-day tour to Israel that's filled with the perfect balance of education, spirituality and fun.

But it's the people you travel with that can turn a good trip into a great one.

On a recent subsidized trip to Israel, organized by Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP), a new social networking group that encourages young Jews to stay connected to their community, 47 Jewish young professionals and students, representing all levels of Jewish involvement came together to rekindle their love affair with the Holy Land.

Travelling from the north to south, east to west, the participants were challenged emotionally, intellectually and spiritually, but also socially.

Despite the fact the JUMP staff makes it a priority to group participants based on age so they can travel with their peers, and despite the fact that all but one of the participants came from the Toronto area, their backgrounds and experiences couldn't have been more diverse.

Still, they were able to find common ground in the connections they made with Israel.

Doron Simacov, 26, was born in Israel and lived there until he was five years old before moving to Toronto, but being a secular Jew, he said he tends to feel an affinity with Israel on a nationalistic level.

The aspect of the tour that resonated with him the most was a meeting at Kibbutz Misgav Am in the Upper Galilee with Arie Ben-Yakov, a 67-year-old kibbutznik who made aliyah in 1961 and is an Israeli war veteran who was unapologetic about his Zionist views.

Ronen Malik, 30, the group's Israeli tour guide and a reservist in the Israel Defence Forces, also shared his dramatic story of war and survival when he served in the Second Lebanon War.

"The main thing that I realized is how Israel survives... The reason such a little place on the map survives is because people are so passionate about it," Simacov said. "They want all Jews to live in Israel and they have so much love for the country. That's what keeps it going."

Keri Saltzman, 26, may connect to Israel in a way that differs from Simacov's experience, but it's just as significant.

Born and raised in Toronto, she is a former Jewish day school student who said she didn't truly begin to explore her heritage and culture until two years ago.

She said her eyes were opened when she travelled to Israel with Aish Hatorah and studied at a seminary for three months. She now considers herself a ba'al tshuvah.

Saltzman said she knew the JUMP trip wasn't going to be framed as a religious tour, but she respected the fact that the madrichim, Debbie Osiel and Shlomo Buzaglio, didn't shy away from incorporating religion into the experience.

"I think it took courage to have the discussions that we did, to bring in the religious aspects and to have two rabbis on the trip," she said, referring to Rabbi Dani Zwick and Rabbi Daniel Green.

"They created a forum for people to learn without feeling threatened or overwhelmed."

What sticks out in Saltzman's mind as a defining moment of the trip was when Malik told the group that while Japan belongs to the Japanese and China belongs to the Chinese, Israel doesn't belong to the Israelis. It belongs to the Jews.

"That hit me straight in my heart. It just reminded me that this is my home, too, even though I'm not a born Israeli and I didn't serve in the army... That Jewish bond extends beyond the land itself. It is just that much stronger," Saltzman said.

Polina Litvak, 28, has never taken the Jewish state for granted. Having grown up in Estonia when it was still part of the Soviet Union, she wasn't part of a thriving Jewish community.

"There wasn't a synagogue or anything, but we did go to community events."

She said that while she doesn't remember being a victim of overt anti-Semitism, "you could get in trouble for being Jewish, but you could also get in trouble for openly attacking Jews... I think my parents just did a good job of protecting me."

Litvak was 13 when the Soviet Union began to crumble. When her father began encountering problems with the law, they made the decision to secretly immigrate to Canada.

"We had to pretend to buy a vacation to Cuba because... If you were openly immigrating, there was a possibility that they wouldn't let you on the plane," she said.

When the plane stopped to refuel in Newfoundland, the Litvak family disembarked the plane and headed to the Canadian immigration office to seek refugee status.

Today, Litvak is a Canadian citizen, and a proud Jew. Although she had travelled to Israel once before, she said this trip opened her eyes to what being Jewish really means.

As she recalled a Shabbat service at the Kotel, she was moved to tears.

"There were so many groups of Jewish people, but they were all in the same place... It wasn't just a service, it was different kinds of people coming together to one important place and it just moved me personally," she said.

"It was more for me a feeling that these people are accepting of me," she said, her voice quivering with emotion. "It's more like a sense of family that is greater than my immediate family. I belong to a nation."

For Kenneth Rose, 26, his story about forging a connection with Judaism and Israel is exceptional.

It wasn't until Rose was 14 that he learned he was Jewish.

When his parents immigrated from Argentina to Canada in the 1970s, they decided that rather than raise their children as Jews, which might expose them to the anti-Semitism they had experienced in Argentina, they chose not to tell them about their heritage.

But when Rose's mother was diagnosed with cancer in 1996, and after she had recovered from complications after her initial surgery, she decided to tell him and his sister that they were, in fact, Jews.

Rose said that he slowly started to become involved in the community. He became a member of a Jewish youth group, he joined a synagogue, and during his first Shabbat service, he had a bar mitzvah.

In the years that followed, with the help of his mother, Rose incorporated Jewish traditions into his home. He became shomer Shabbat and started keeping kosher.

"But after my mother passed away three years ago, I went through a rebellious phase and I questioned God," he said. "But now I'm back and I go to synagogue, not every Saturday, but some Saturdays, and I keep all the holidays."

Rose added that programs like the JUMP tour help him stay connected.

"Being back there really rejuvenated my spirit. I'm longing for Israel, and I can't wait until the next time I get to go back."

But there is another reason Israel will always have a special place in his heart: during the tour, Rose decided to ask Candice Chatz, a JUMP participant and his girlfriend of three years, to marry him.

While it may be difficult for the 47 participants to come to a consensus about the defining moment of the tour, most would agree that an important element would have been missing without their tour guide.

"Ronen was the highlight. He exemplifies in so many ways a mensch... I just felt that he was able to connect with all of us in our own way and give us the history and the religion and the culture just by being who he is," Saltzman said.

"There is no one face to Israel. There are many faces, but he exemplifies what it means to be a Jew - his commitment to his family, his commitment to his country, and his commitment to his religion."

Celebrating Tu b'Shvat

Mindy Klein teaches nursery students at Netivot HaTorah Day School the significance of the four glasses of varying shades of grape juice consumed as part of a Tu b'Shvat seder that included parents. [Rebecca Ansel photo]

From left, Joanna Mansfield, Lori Wasserman and Alexandra Sipos-Kocsis were among the 150 participants in this year's Tu b'Shvat seder run by Torat HaTeva, a Jewish environmental organization. The Kabbalah-based event at Anshei Minsk Congregation explored Jewish texts and teachings relating to trees, food and the natural world, and featured organic fruits, nuts, juice and cookies, as well as drumming, singing and dancing. Grade 2 and 3 students at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School came together for a special Tu b'Shvat seder.

Students study Afghan mission

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — High school students at Gray Academy of Jewish Education got a crash course on Afghanistan and Canada's mission there as part of commemorations marking Raoul Wallenberg Day.

The day-long series of seminars on Jan 17 helped mark the day set aside by the government of Canada to honour the legacy of the Swedish diplomat who saved more than 100,000 Jewish lives during the Holocaust.

It was the third year in a row that Gray Academy, in conjunction with the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, organized the high school student conference on human rights. Last year, students learned about Africa and heard from several African refugees living in Winnipeg.

The day began with a short film presentation on Afghanistan, followed by a keynote address by Capt. Dave Murrall of the Canadian Forces 17 Wing air force unit in Winnipeg and a veteran of the Afghan campaign. He spoke about Canada's role in Afghanistan and described "a day in the life of a soldier in Kandahar".

Following his address were several break-out sessions led by a number of guest speakers, including Daniel Ashrafi, an Iranian-born Jew who served in the Iranian air force under the Shah, who is currently living in Winnipeg (he spoke about terrorism and the Taliban); Prof. Richard Gordon, a theoretical biologist who started "Books With Wings," a project that ships medical and other books to universities in Afghanistan; Dr. Wassay Niazi, a specialist in microbiology and infectious diseases who was forced to leave Afghanistan by the Taliban; and his daughter, Meena Niazi, currently a student at the University of Manitoba, who spoke about growing up in Afghanistan and about its people, culture and hopes for the future.

Other speakers included Ariana Yafali from the Manitoba Interfaith Immigration Council, who discussed the challenges faced by Afghans in adapting to life in Manitoba; and Alex Dobrota, a former Globe and Mail journalist, currently studying Law at McGill University, who was embedded with Canadian troops in Kandahar for three weeks last summer.

Progress in Afghanistan has been slow, Dobrota said. "But pulling out our troops now is unrealistic and would bring more harm than good. The Afghan army, the national police and the people depend on us. If the goal of our mission is to bring security to the region, even 2009 is too early to withdraw."

During the closing session, students honoured fallen soldiers from CFB Shilo, an armed forces base in western Manitoba, with a display of photos of those who have been killed in Afghanistan and a short film created by Gray Academy student Jorel Minuk picturing each of the fallen soldiers. David Rubinfeld, who is in Grade 12 at Gray Academy, lit a yahrzeit candle in memory of the soldiers.

The students also presented Joy Smith, MP for Winnipeg's Kildonan-St. Paul riding, with a book of letters to give to Prime Minister Stephen Harper. In their letters, the students expressed strong support for Canada's mission in Afghanistan and the pride they feel for its effort to promote security, democracy and human rights there.

"We hope that by exposing students to the history and challenges facing Afghanistan, they have gained a better understanding of the human rights issues involved," said Shelley Faintuch, the federation's director of community relations and a driving force behind the Wallenberg Day commemoration.

"Raoul Wallenberg demonstrated how one person can make a difference. With information at their fingertips, students will be empowered to develop action plans to help those in need in an area of the world where turmoil and human rights abuses have prevailed for so long."

Nursing home denies wrongdoing in resident's death

By RHONDA SPIVAK

Special to the C/JN

WINNIPEG — The head of Winnipeg's main Jewish retirement home says the death of one of its residents from hypothermia is a "tragedy," but there's nothing that reasonably could have been done to prevent it.

Barry Collen, 74, froze to death Jan. 2 at the Sharon Home branch in the city's north end after being outside for 3½ hours in -20 Celsius weather. The developmentally challenged man had gone for a cigarette in the building's courtyard, where his body was found at around 4:30 a.m.

He had apparently fallen and banged his head, and was found lying in a pool of blood.

Sandra Delorme, the Sharon Home's president and CEO, said Collen's mental capacity "was much more than a five-year-old," contrary to what his sister-in-law, Ann Collen, told The C/JN and Winnipeg Free Press.

"Barry bought himself a bus pass, and he would often go to the Garden City Mall," Delorme said. "He'd also go downtown to Eaton Place occasionally. He was quite capable of being mobile. If it were true that he had the mental capacity of a five-year-old, he wouldn't have been going downtown on his own. I wouldn't let a five-year-old go downtown by themselves. The doctors and nurses would have had a different care plan for him."

When asked to give her assessment of what Collen's mental capacity was, Delorme answered, "I can't tell you what his age was in terms of mental capacity. He'd done this [taking buses on his own] all of his life, and we saw no valid reason for him not to continue. We don't want people to feel [the Sharon Home] is a jail."

According to Delorme, as of April 2004, a month before Collen became a resident at the home, "the smoking room in the building was shut down," and thus was not available to any of the four residents who smoked, including Collen, who became a resident a month later.

"It is not the case that Barry was banned from the smoking room as Ann Collen has claimed, as the room was shut down altogether," Delorme said.

She described the smoking room on the second floor as "having space for two people that was not properly vented and [as of April 2004] it didn't meet the requirements of the WRHA [Winnipeg Regional Health Authority]."

"After the smoking room was shut down, we stopped taking residents who smoked. The [Sharon Home] board grandfathered the residents [including Collen] who smoked. We permitted these residents and staff to smoke in the interior courtyard," Delorme said.

She noted that currently there are only two retirement residences in the city that allow smoking.

When asked whether the WRHA was advised of what the Sharon Home was doing to accommodate smokers by having them use the courtyard, Delorme responded, "I don't know. I can't answer that. It was close to four years ago."

Delorme said that the "inner courtyard [where Collen went to smoke] is safe and secure and surrounded by buildings."

She added: "In order to get into the courtyard, there is a key pad and you enter a code and open the door. To get out of the courtyard, you go to the door and just push a red button and you can open the door."

She said that Collen "had been doing this for four years without any problem, and there was no reason to suspect that there would be any problem with his continuing to do so."

According to Delorme, "the courtyard is lit up at night. There are lights in there. There's a seating area, benches and chairs."

When asked how often staff at the nursing home do bed checks at night, Delorme answered, "We do rounds hourly throughout the night."

She added that staff would not be concerned if Collen was not in his room, since he "was a resident who roamed around and could be anywhere in the building. He liked to go out [of his room] frequently."

The WRHA is continuing its investigation into Collen's death.

He suffered from Charcot-Marie-Tooth syndrome, which makes it difficult to feel numbness or cold.

It is not known why Collen couldn't get back into the building from the courtyard, although it appears he fell and banged his head.

Disease may have mutated from a childhood illness

He explained that as of 25 years ago, yaws was thought to have been eradicated in the western hemisphere due to massive inoculation campaigns by the World Health Organization in the 1950s and 1960s.

However, as Silverman and his team journeyed further into the interior of Guyana on their annual missions of chesed and tikkun olam, they noticed that yaws was still in existence.

"It was primarily a childhood disease, affecting about 5.1 per cent of the child population," Silverman said. "And the [yaws] sores were found mostly on children's arms or legs... because that's the skin that would come into contact with each other to spread the disease. But it would have been something almost everyone contracted in youth... so yaws would have had no need to develop into a sexually transmitted disease [in the New World]."

Silverman and fellow researchers hypothesize that the disease mutated from a childhood illness to a sexually transmitted disease because Columbus' men, who travelled fully clothed, would have exposed only their genitalia to the disease during sexual activity in the New World. The disease would have then adapted to exposure to this new body area and become much more virulent in a population without any natural immunity, spreading easily between sexual partners.

The result was what historians call "The Great Pox," which killed nearly five million people in Europe.

While discovering the source of syphilis provided some fun media attention, Silverman said he's much more gratified at the results of Ve'ahavta's campaign to wipe out yaws in Guyana.

"I'm most proud of the fact that it seems we've eradicated a childhood scourge," Silverman said, adding that return missions to Guyana since 2005 have failed to turn up a single new case of yaws.

Exhibit gives glimpse of Jewish life in Zimbabwe

By LAUREN KRAMER

Special to The C.J.N.

VANCOUVER — "Rabbi Among the Lions," a photographic exhibit at the Jewish Museum and Archives of British Columbia, gives viewers a glimpse of the Jewish community of Bulawayo, Zimbabwe.

Tobi Asmoucha, 39, a Toronto photographer whose brother, Nathan, 37, served as the rabbi of the Bulawayo Jewish Community from September 2003 to August 2007, took the pictures that make up the exhibit.

Rabbi Asmoucha's adventure began while he was studying in a Jerusalem yeshiva. There, he was approached by Steven Feigenbaum, a Bulawayo-born Israeli resident whose father is president of the Bulawayo Jewish community. "He was looking to meet potential candidates to serve as rabbi of the congregation, and when he offered us a position, we realized we could learn and grow by being there," Rabbi Asmoucha recalls.

He and his family arrived in Bulawayo to find a community of 100, of which one-third live in Savyon Lodge, a home for the Jewish aged. Of the 200 students at the Carmel Jewish Day School in Bulawayo, only five were Jewish, and two of those children were the new rabbi's. The rest of the student body comprised Hindu, Muslim, Ndebele, Shona, Asian and European children.

Within weeks of Rabbi Asmoucha's arrival, the Bulawayo synagogue went up in flames, but its Torah scrolls and Ark curtain, both of which date back to 1725, were rescued from the fire in the nick of time. The mikvah remained intact and is still in use, but the congregation had to move to Bulawayo's old Reform shul, Sinai Synagogue and Hall.

In a three-week-long visit to the city to see her brother in 2006, Tobi took pictures of children at prayer, of Bulawayo street scenes; and of community members, including a portrait of Ruth Feigenbaum, who founded a support group for families of people who are terminally ill. In Zimbabwe, AIDS has ravaged the population. One-quarter of all Zimbabwe's children have been rendered orphans by the disease, and many of them are being raised by their grandparents.

"I came away touched by the extent to which people support each other in this very small but very warm, generous community," she says. "Even though the community is diminishing, people are looking after each other."

Despite that Vancouver and Bulawayo are on different sides of the world, there are parallels between the communities, says Ron Ulrich, director of the Jewish museum. "In any museum, the dialogue cannot be just about the past, it must deal with the present and future, too, to be relevant. This exhibition deals with relevant themes in the Jewish world, such as an aging community whereas, in the 1950s and 1960s, it was vibrant and had up to 3,000 Jewish members."

"This is about community memory and the perpetuation of Jewish life and culture. The immigrants to Bulawayo were of the same Lithuanian descent as many of Vancouver's Jews, and we see Jewish community members performing mitzvot and dealing with AIDS, a disease that affects us here, too, although not to the same extent. There are lots of parallel issues."

Tobi's exhibition got its name from an image of Rabbi Asmoucha walking in Antelope Park, a place where African lion cubs are being bred and rehabilitated. Behind him and at his sides are three adolescent cubs.

"Rabbi Among the Lions" runs until June 2008.

Winnipeg has new federation president

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Although Jonathan Kroft, the new president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, is a lawyer by vocation, his avocation, he says, has always been community work.

In fact, he is from a family steeped in community work and volunteerism. His father, Justice Guy Kroft, was president of the community in the early 1980s. His mother, Hester, has a long history of community work. And he, his brother, David, and his sisters, Debbie Hoffman and Sarah Morry, have all been recipients of young leadership awards presented annually by the Jewish community.

Jonathan Kroft first began his volunteer activities with federation (which was then known as the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council) in the mid-1980s, shortly after he was called to the bar.

He earned his law degree at the University of Manitoba and followed up with a master's degree in law from Harvard in 1990.

"I started [my community involvement] as a canvasser and as a member of the community relations committee," he recalls.

Over the years, Kroft has also been active with the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee and the Winnipeg Jewish community's Jewish Child and Family Services, as well as working with numerous legal and general community organizations.

Kroft notes that while he was a member of the Jewish federation executive for many years, he had previously declined the presidency because he wanted to have more time to spend with his young family. He and his wife, Cara, have two children — Emily, 10, and Daniel, who celebrated his bar mitzvah last spring.

"Two years ago, I finally made the commitment [to the community]," he says.

A couple of months ago, before assuming the role of president, Kroft determined what he felt the role of the federation is in the community. "I see the purpose of the federation as identifying, co-ordinating and supporting programs and services that make Winnipeg a good place to lead a full Jewish life at a high level now and in the future," he says.

"There are tough questions we have to answer, such as what constitutes leading a Jewish life today. Are we maintaining the infrastructure we need? Are we using our limited resources in the most effective manner? And where will we need the resources we will need in future to support existing programs and institutions and new programs and institutions that may arise?"

Kroft has praise for his predecessor as president, Ted Lyons; Jewish federation executive director, Bob Freedman; and his staff and community volunteers for their success in bringing new members to the community, which now numbers about 17,000 as compared to about 14,500 six years ago.

"I am proud of the community-wide effort to integrate the newer members of our community," he says, "although there is still much work to be done."

"Our goal as a federation is to make sure that Winnipeg remains a great place to live a Jewish life."

Canadians visit patients at Save a Child's Heart

Organization treats kids with congenital heart problems

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When nearly 50 Canadian Jews travelled to Israel on a 10-day tour earlier this month, they knew they'd be visiting children who are waiting for life-saving heart surgery funded by a humanitarian organization, but they weren't sure what to expect.

The visit to Save a Child's Heart (SACH), a non-profit organization based in Holon that treats children from all over the world with congenital heart problems, was part of a tikkun olam theme on a post-birthright, subsidized Israel tour for Jewish students and young professionals, organized by Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP), a new group that works to give young Jews the opportunity to stay connected to the community.

The participants brought toys and school supplies to the children, who are brought to the SACH house in Holon from Africa, Asia, South America, Europe and the Middle East, where they stay while awaiting free surgery at the nearby Wolfson Medical Center.

What would the atmosphere in the house be like? Would the children be weak and withdrawn, sick and sad?

The participants found dedicated staff, volunteers and nurses who lived in the home to make the children's stay in Israel as comfortable as possible, and 17 kids between the ages of six months and 17 years, who were excited to play and laugh with their visitors.

Laura Kafif, the house mother, talked about her admiration for the children's strength and bravery during such a difficult time.

"To be here, sometimes without a mother, [coming] from a village all the way to Israel to undergo a surgery – it's quite a traumatic thing for them. Actually, the children are amazing. If it was me that was going through it, I wouldn't be half as good as they are," Kafif said.

In the hope of brightening up their day, participants brought the children toys and supplies including dolls, colouring books, markers, cards and board games.

The need for these things is most North American kids take for granted became apparent when Kafif explained that these children, most of whom come from poor villages in Africa and the Middle East, don't have access to them.

"Basically the things that we do here are things that we would do in the gan [preschool]. Don't forget that these children come from villages where they don't have a lot of toys, they don't have a lot of paper or crayons or things like that," Kafif said.

Lindsay Malet, right, a JUMP participant, holds Tara, an Iraqi heart patient who is in Israel to receive free life-saving surgery courtesy of Save a Child's Heart.

Tova Vertes, a Canadian student from Dundas, Ont., who was completing her three-month stay in the home, talked about the importance of her role as a volunteer and reflected on the impact that it had on her.

"It's been an amazing experience, and I really learned a lot about how to deal with children... We have learning barriers and cultural barriers, and the first couple of weeks that you come here are very difficult, but then... you find ways of doing things that make them happy without speaking too much English."

Since SACH was established in 1996, 1,800 children have been treated by Israeli doctors at the Wolfson Medical Center, where SACH has an agreement that permits the organization to use all the facilities of the hospital, provided that they are able to raise funds to supplement the cost.

"It costs $10,000 for each child. Seven thousand dollars goes to the hospital for whatever they need, whether it covers just a tiny little bit [of the cost] or it covers nine months of treatment, and the rest is for plane fare, housing, food and things like that," said Jonah Mink, SACH's student co-ordinator.

"All of our donations are private donations. The EU [European Union] gave us 1.5 million Euro to treat Palestinians and start a fellowship program for Palestinian doctors."

In addition to creating fellowship programs to train doctors around the world, doctors and volunteers associated with SACH go on medical missions every year to less-developed countries to evaluate potential patients.

Kafif said that on a mission to Panama last year, she recalled seeing families – children and their parents – sitting on the floors of the hospital courtyards waiting to be seen by doctors.

"It's like something you've seen in a documentary. Until you see it with your own eyes, it's really difficult to imagine."

She said that on their most recent trip, an Israeli delegation travelled to Amman, Jordan, to set up a clinic at the Red Crescent Hospital. SACH doctors, including Dr. Sion Hour, the director of the pediatric intensive care unit at Wolfson Medical Center, screened 38 Iraqi children. Although they were able to arrange to treat a majority of the Iraqi children, some of the patients were beyond help.

"They actually had to sit and tell them, 'I'm sorry we can't help you with your child.' That was very difficult," Kafif said.

Among the group of children that the doctors were able to treat was Tara.

When the doctors first saw Tara, she was five months old and underweight. Her skin was blue because of a lack of oxygen in her blood.

Tara was suffering from a cyanotic heart disease, a congenital heart defect that results in low blood oxygen levels, and she would surely die if not treated immediately.

"She was surviving by a connection [from the lungs] to the two main arteries that only exists in utero," Hour told The C/JN three months ago, just days after Tara's first surgery.

"We just added a tube to bring more blood to the lungs and we decided she was too sick to have the final surgery at this stage."

Tara's mother, who travelled with her daughter to Israel, has been living in the SACH house for the past three months and is currently waiting for the final surgery. During JUMP's visit to the house, the participants were able to interact with Tara, who has gained strength and weight since her first surgery.

Mink is currently touring Canadian campuses as part of a SACH tour put together by National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) and the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) to raise awareness about the organization.

Mink, who already visited Edmonton, Calgary and Saskatoon, will travel to Vancouver, Victoria, Toronto, Ottawa, Halifax, Montreal, St. Catharines and London.

A 'bold and brave' decision

end its "siege" of Gaza. The UNHRC will be chaired in 2009 by Libya and vice-chaired by Cuba, with Iran sitting on the Durban II organizing committee.

The American and Israeli delegations both walked out of Durban I in disputes over language that sought to equate Zionism with racism. The conference was also heavily criticized by Jewish groups and others worldwide for its blatant anti-Semitic bias and extreme focus on Israel.

Canadian Jewish groups lauded the government's decision to withdraw from Durban II.

Canadian Jewish Congress called the withdrawal a "solid and principled" stance, while B'nai Brith said Canada acted "honourably" in the matter.

Amir Gissin, Israeli consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, also praised the decision.

"We see [Durban II] as an anti-Israeli, anti-Semitic circus," Gissin told The C/JN. "Canada's decision not to lend its hand to it is something we greatly appreciate... and hope sets an example for the rest of the world."

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, called the decision "bold and brave."

"The fact that Canada has tried its best to change the mood and tenor of Durban II and... see to it that the poisonous atmosphere of 2001 is not repeated, speaks volumes about this government's commitment to... values of freedom and liberty," Adler said.

Even members of the Opposition applauded Ottawa's choice.

The group Liberal Parliamentarians for Israel – co-chaired by Winnipeg South Centre MP Anita Neville and Senator David Smith – issued its own statement.

"We are pleased that the government is finally taking this issue seriously and is doing the right thing," Neville said.

Smith added: "It is inappropriate for Canada to advance the international human rights agenda through a forum that makes a mockery of the fight against racism and discrimination."

Various Canadian NGOs have denounced the government's move, saying an official Canadian presence should be a part of any conference on racism.

Though the Durban I conference was overshadowed by the later events of Sept. 11, 2001, many remember how a forum that was supposed to be a watershed gathering aimed at fighting racism and discrimination was hijacked by an anti-Israel agenda.

Speaking to The C/JN last week, Liberal MP, noted human rights advocate and former federal justice minister Irwin Cotler said he was pleased that the government pulled out of Durban II.

"[Ottawa] made the right decision in not being there," he said. "All the preparatory signs for Durban II [indicate] a re-run of Durban I. Those of us who were at Durban I and witnessed that festival of hate will never forget the depth and pervasiveness of the hate at that conference."

Cotler added that besides the fact that Iran, Libya and Cuba – all "oppressive regimes [and] all explicit in their anti-Israeli indictments," he said – are on the organizing committee of Durban II, there is another reason to shun the conference.

"The UNHRC, which has made a fetish of condemning Israel while giving major human rights violators exculpatory immunity... will have the super-attending authority over [preparatory committees] on the way to Durban II," he said. "And the meetings of the prep-comms are scheduled to take place on both Passover and Yom Kippur. One would have thought that with the remembrance of Durban I, the organizers would have been sensitive to anything that appears to exclude Jews, Israel and their representatives. They chose not only to ignore [the lessons of] Durban I, but to repeat... a mocking insensitivity to the Jewish people."

Cotler expressed hope that Canada would now consider hosting an "alternative" anti-racism conference to demonstrate that Ottawa is committed to being at "the forefront of the struggle against racism."

Cotler said he would promote the idea in Ottawa.

UNHRC denounces Israel over Gaza blockade

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

Staff Reporter

The UN Human Rights Council last week adopted a resolution calling for an "end to grave violations committed by Israel" against Gaza.

It also calls on "the occupying power, Israel" to immediately "lift the siege it has imposed on the Gaza Strip."

The motion was brought forward by Syria on behalf of the Group of Arab States and the Organization of the Islamic Conference and was passed by a count of 30 votes for, one against and 15 abstentions.

Canada was the lone member-state to vote against the resolution. The United States and Israel are not part of the council.

Nowhere in the text of the resolution are calls made to end daily rocket fire from Gaza into Israel.

Citing the absence of any balanced language in the resolution, Slovenia, speaking on behalf of the rest of the European Union voting members, decided to abstain, saying the resolution lacked "an acknowledgement of civilian casualties on both sides."

In a Jan. 24 Associated Press report, Louise Arbour, the UN high commissioner for human rights and former Canadian Supreme Court justice, said Israel's closure of the Gaza border was causing "desperation" for Palestinians.

The same report quotes Israel's ambassador to the UN, Izhak Levanon, as saying, "I am glad Israel did not participate in this circus."

Canadian Jewish groups hailed Canada's vote against the resolution.

In a personal letter, Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, thanked Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Bernier for Canada's stance on the council.

"I greatly appreciate Canada's support for Israel's right to security and its condemnation of Palestinian terrorist attacks," Ronen wrote. "Canada demonstrated principled leadership in voting against such a one-sided resolution and sent a clear message to the world that Canadians will not accept the hijacking of UN institutions."

U.S. Ambassador Warren Tichenor said the council had "squandered its credibility" by failing to address continued rocket attacks against Israel.

The council's actions, he said "do nothing to help the Palestinian people, in whose name the supporters of this session claim to act."

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. They should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 14. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Submissions will not be returned. The CJN will not enter into any correspondence with participants.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2008 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 29, 2008. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 2008.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 20, 2008. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Israel re-thinks Gaza strategy

By ROY EITAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — The few hundred pounds of TNT that brought Rafah's border wall tumbling down has also shaken Israel's strategy of isolating Hamas.

The Ehud Olmert government watched helplessly last Wednesday as the Islamist group, responding to Israel's tightening of its blockade on the Gaza Strip, blew holes through the border wall between Gaza and Egypt, enabling tens of thousands of Palestinians to surge across the border and stock up on food, fuel and other provisions.

Before the dust settled at Rafah, both Israel and Egypt were faced with a new reality, one that some Israelis suggested wasn't all bad. Israel's closure of Gaza, imposed after Hamas seized control of the strip last June and tightened following a surge of cross-border rocket fire last week against Israel, was no more.

In breaking down the border, Hamas burnished its reputation among Palestinians, further humiliating Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction, which it defeated in elections last January and with violence in June. And in brazenly sidestepping Israel's blockade, which had already stirred international censure, Hamas put Israel on the defensive.

Fearing that Palestinian terrorists who regularly tunnel under the Gaza-Egypt border are now at liberty to transport weapons and fighters across the border as they please, towns in southern Israel went on high alert, and the military deployed reinforcements.

Because the Egypt-Israel border is more permeable than the Gaza-Israel border, the Israeli army warned that Palestinian terrorists could use Egypt as a staging ground for attacks on Israelis. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office issued an urgent advisory to Israelis vacationing in Sinai to hurry home.

"This was a resounding failure, a public relations disaster," Danny Ayalon, Israel's former ambassador to the United States, told Reuters. "And we've lost deterrence."

Some in Jerusalem saw a silver lining in the chaos, suggesting that the elimination of the Gaza-Egypt border provided an opportunity for strategic rethinking.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak's deputy, Matan Vilnai, said Israel can now finalize its disengagement from Gaza, begun with the withdrawal of troops and settlers in 2005.

"We need to understand that when Gaza is open to the other side, we lose responsibility for it," Vilnai told Army Radio. "So we want to disengage from it."

Other Israeli officials, speaking privately, said this could be a prelude to a full return of Egyptian authority over Gaza. Egypt controlled the crowded coastal territory until Israel captured it in the 1967 Six Day War, a loss Cairo never appeared to mourn.

"For years, Israel begged to share its control over the territories with Jordan and Egypt. But King Hussein disengaged from the West Bank in the mid-1980s, and Egypt, which had always perceived the Gaza Strip as a black pit of terrorism, said, 'No thank you,'" Smadar Perry wrote in the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot. "Yesterday, the black pit of Gaza was forcibly linked to Egypt."

Throughout the crisis, Cairo has played it cool. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak spoke of the sudden influx of Palestinians — the number was put at between 80,000 and 350,000 — as a humanitarian necessity, making no mention of the fact that his regime had been a partner of Israel in efforts to seal off Gaza and thus weaken Hamas.

"Let them eat, buy food and then go back," Mubarak said. "Egypt will not allow Gaza to starve."

It's unclear when, or even if, the mile-long border wall at Rafah will be rebuilt. As long as the border stays open, Palestinian terrorists will be able to freely bring arms and cash into Gaza from the Egyptian Sinai, Israeli officials warned.

So far, the Olmert government has avoided overt criticism of Egypt, the first Arab power to have recognized the Jewish state.

"I believe Egypt knows what its job is, and we expect them to perform their task in the framework of agreements," Barak said after the border was breached.

Egypt may have its own concerns about its new open connection with the Hamas-run Gaza.

Hamas' power in the strip will only stoke the flames of its kindred faction in Cairo, the Muslim Brotherhood. The Brotherhood is the most virulent political opposition Mubarak faces, and Jerusalem's nightmare — and Mubarak's — is that one day it will take over Egypt.

Perhaps not surprisingly, while Mubarak was speaking kindly of the plight of Gaza's Palestinians, his security forces were rounding up Muslim Brotherhood members taking part in pro-Palestinian protests.

Asked about Gaza's new reality, the United States reiterated its stance that the strip must be considered, along with the West Bank, part of the future Palestinian state — a show of support for Abbas' claim to represent Palestinians in both territories.

Olmert stresses peace credentials at Herzliya

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

HERZLIYA, Israel — Fighting for his political life, prime minister Ehud Olmert told the Israeli people that keeping him in office was their best hope of reaching the promised land of peace.

"There is no other option to what I am offering," Olmert said last week in his keynote address at the Herzliya Conference, referring to ambitious peace efforts with the Palestinians launched under the aegis of the United States at the Annapolis, Md., peace conference last November.

It was an embattled Olmert who showed up just one week before the publication of the final report of the Winograd Commission investigating his and other top officials' actions in the 2006 Lebanon war.

Calls for Olmert's resignation have been growing from political rivals, bereaved families and even Israel Defence Forces reserve officers.

After the speech, Maj.-Gen. Eyal Ben-Reuven said Olmert's words of hope cannot conceal his failures in the 2006 war with Hezbollah. "The prime minister earned a failing grade in the supreme test of any state," Ben-Reuven said to Army Radio of Olmert's management of the war.

The prime minister's address at the annual Herzliya Conference has become a platform for Israeli leaders to present major policy initiatives.

Olmert used the speech not for any dramatic surprises but to state his case that despite past errors, the country is on the right track.

"I come to speak of the future," Olmert said in his opening remarks, quickly sidestepping calls for his dismissal. "I believe responsible leadership can deal with criticism... and continue forward."

He said the negotiations with the Palestinian Authority were full of risks and questions but repeated the message that they are the only way Israel can break the cycle of conflict the country has been locked in since the state was born.

"We have no right to squander this chance," Olmert said. "Our nation has been waiting for a light at the end of the tunnel."

"We have no horizon of hope more promising than speaking with the current Palestinian leadership. Some say it is weak," he said, and "unable to hold up to agreements. I say this is the best [Palestinian] leadership we could have."

Olmert warned that if action is not taken now, there might not be a democratic state with a Jewish majority to call home in the future.

Although the Gaza Strip and the southern Israeli town of Sderot are the current front lines of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Olmert referred only briefly to the situation there. Israel has faced international criticism for limiting Gaza's fuel supplies.

"We will not permit, under any circumstances or conditions, a humanitarian crisis to develop," Olmert said. "We will not harm the supply of food for children, medicine for those who need it and fuel for institutions that save lives."

"But there is no justification for demanding we allow residents of Gaza to live normal lives while shells and rockets are fired from their streets and courtyards at Sderot and other communities in the south."

Olmert touted the quiet that has prevailed in the north of the country since the end of the 2006 war, saying the past 18 months of rocket-free life on the border was the longest stretch of calm there in the past 25 years.

"Our enemies in the north are in no rush to fight us, and they know why," he said, offering that the reasons Hezbollah refrains from reigniting violence with Israel "are known to all who need to know."

"These reasons reflect the enormous might of Israel," Olmert added.

A former corporate lawyer, Olmert defended himself while acknowledging mistakes were made.

"I have no regrets about the vital decisions that I led as prime minister, not those linked with the fighting in Lebanon, nor those related to other matters," he said.

"Mistakes were made, yes. There were failures — definitely. But lessons were learned, flaws were fixed, modes of operating were changed and principally, the decisions that I have made since then have brought greater security, more quiet, less terror, greater deterrence and more prosperity for the State of Israel than it has had in many years."

Ben Caspit, a senior political columnist for Israel's daily Ma'ariv, said Olmert's speech was good, comprehensive, "even moving." But he argued that no matter what Olmert says or how he says it, his fate remains on the line.

"Whatever he says now, one week before the Winograd Committee determines his fate, is subject to a warning comment. All his high-flown peace talk requires proof," he wrote in last Thursday's paper. "Yesterday, he gave his speech for the defence, from the depths of his heart, firing the opening shot of the race of his life, even before the race has started."

Border guard killed

A Palestinian group claimed responsibility for killing an Israeli border guard in a shooting attack near Jerusalem. Rami Zoari, 20, from Be'er Sheva, was killed the night of Jan. 24 in a shooting near Shuafat just outside northern Jerusalem. Another border guard was wounded. The Battalions of Struggle and Return, a previously unknown offshoot of Fatah's Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, claimed responsibility, Israel Radio reported.

Israel Briefs

witness to in Arabic countries, we want to offer an alternative source of information to moderates in these countries to provide them with reliable information about the Shoah," said Yad Vashem chairman Avner Shalev. In 2007, nearly seven million people from more than 200 countries visited www.yadvashem.org, including 32,500 from Arab countries.

Egypt-Gaza link sought

Israeli officials proposed that Egypt take over responsibility for supplying the Gaza Strip. Israeli media quoted members of the Olmert government as saying that after tens of thousands of Palestinians overran the Gaza-Egypt border, there was an opportunity to demand that Cairo take care of the needs of the coastal territory. Egypt currently supplies some electricity to Gaza, but Palestinians there are otherwise dependent on Israel, a situation that Jerusalem wants to end, completing a "disengagement" begun in 2005. "We need to understand that when Gaza is open to the other side, we lose responsibility for it. So we want to disengage from it," Deputy Defence Minister Matan Vilnai told Army Radio. "We are responsible as long as there is no alternative." Egypt controlled Gaza until Israel captured the territory in the 1967 Six-Day War. It has made clear it does not want to return to ruling the congested and impoverished territory.

Defence trumps reputation

Israel's self-defence is more important than finding favour in foreign eyes, its foreign minister said. Tzipi Livni said in a speech that while the Olmert government is serious about trying to make peace with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, its efforts are hobbled by the power of Hamas and the threat it and other terrorists pose to Israel. That, Livni told the Herzliya Conference, means Israel must continue fighting in Gaza even as it courts Abbas, though the violence generates international censure and occasional accusations of poor faith. "I believe that we do not need to apologize for our existence or for protecting our citizens, even at the cost of criticism from the international community," she said.

Sopranos star discovers her Jewish spirit on birthright

By DINA KRAFT

JTA

JAFFA, Israel — Meadow Soprano, Jewish?

"Everyone assumes I'm Italian," Jamie Lynn Sigler, 26, said with a sigh, pausing over her hummus lunch at the open-air market in Jaffa, one of the stops on her birthright Israel tour.

"Even kids on the trip keep asking, 'Are you Jewish?'"

Sigler, who played the daughter of Mafia kingpin Tony Soprano on the acclaimed HBO show The Sopranos, grew up in a Jewish home in Jericho, N.Y., going to Hebrew school and having a bat mitzvah.

Her father's family immigrated to America from Greece and Poland. Her mother, who is Puerto Rican, converted to Judaism.

But it was only while touring in Israel, during her recent visit to the country, that she said she felt a true spiritual and emotional connection to her roots.

"It's one of the most beautiful, inspiring places I've ever been to," Sigler said. "I now have a greater understanding and motivation about preserving my Jewishness."

Among the highlights she noted were riding camels in the desert, dining on roast lamb in a Bedouin tent and exploring the back alleys of Jerusalem's Old City.

Sigler said she was especially moved during her visits to the Western Wall, where she was surprised by her tears, and to Yad Vashem, where the Holocaust and its history suddenly felt deeply personal.

"I started to think, 'What if I was there, what if I had been ripped away from my family?'" she said.

Sigler said Israel had been a fairly abstract concept to her before the trip, with her images of it limited to the coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict portrayed in the media.

On the birthright trip, which brings Diaspora young people between 18 and 26 to Israel for free 10-day tours, her group was accompanied part of the time by a small group of Israeli soldiers.

Through them, Sigler said she heard about a much different life than the one she and her friends lead in America. She was impressed by their sacrifices and the pride they have in their country and history.

"It's so different but so inspiring to be part of that," said Sigler, her face dominated by a pair of large designer sunglasses. "I would want to move here and join the army too."

She bonded quickly with the other birthright participants. Sigler and her new friends kidded about returning to Israel together and renting apartments in the same building.

She compared these fast and seamless friendships to her experience with the cast and crew of The Sopranos.

"It's a similar dynamic — people loving what they are doing," she said.

Sigler acknowledged it's been difficult realizing that the show, considered to be among the seminal works of television drama, is finally over after six seasons. She has plans to move to Los Angeles and continue her acting career.

So would Tony have allowed Meadow to come to Israel?

"Probably not," she said.

Her friend, noting that Tony's mob rivals were out to kill him by the end of the series, interjected: "What are you talking about? It's probably safer for Meadow in Israel than near her father."

Sigler laughed and agreed that this was probably true.

Israel to field electric cars

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government is sponsoring a campaign to encourage widespread use of electric cars.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert signed a deal last week with Renault-Nissan CEO Carlos Ghosn under which the automotive conglomerate will produce electric cars for mass distribution in Israel beginning in 2011.

Project Better Place, a company headed by Israeli venture capitalist Shai Agassi, will construct a national grid of thousands of stations where the cars can be recharged.

The signatories said Israel would be a proving ground for turning electric cars into the mass transit of choice in an era of oil jitters and environmental concerns.

According to Olmert, the government hopes to eliminate gasoline-based transportation in Israel by 2020.

Learning to remember (and forget) Belgrade

Tsing by David Albahari, Northwestern University Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

One of the darkest chapters in postwar European life is undergoing a second act this month, as Serbs ready themselves for a run-off in their national election for president.

Norman Ravvin

The lead competitors are a mild pro-western incumbent and a more strident nationalist who was an ally of Serbian leader Slobodan Milosevic during the Balkans' disastrous descent into civil war and ethnic killing. Aside from deciding which direction the country will take, the Serb election is also expected to trigger a declaration of independence from Kosovar Albanians, the target of what western commentators euphemistically called the Serbian efforts to "ethnically cleanse" their country.

Undoubtedly, the aftermath of NATO bombing and the revelation of substantial massacres of Bosnian Muslims marked the Serbs as the devils in this conflict, and a surprising number of Serbs continue to bear a marked victim complex, as if the war their leaders engineered were someone else's doing.

But Belgrade – a wonderful holdover from the Austro-Hungarian empire with deep Turkish influences – is little known or understood in the West.

Large numbers of Serbs chose Canada as their second home during the Balkan Wars of the 1990s and with them came writers well worth reading.

Among the most provocative of these is David Albahari, who has lived in Calgary since 1994. Arriving there with a major reputation in the literary world of the former Yugoslavia, he has gone on to create his own second act – a literary oeuvre in English, in which he is often the translator of his own works from the original Serb.

A recently translated novel, Gotz and Meyer, tells the little-remarked-upon history of the German massacre of Belgrade's long-established Jewish community using trucks with a crude mechanism to asphyxiate their victims with the vehicles' exhaust. The destruction of Serbian Jews was an early undertaking, completed in 1942 with the collaboration of Croatian militia.

But it is another novella, called Tsing in English, Cink in the original, which reflects in uncanny ways the hiddenness, the lack of public acknowledgment of the German crime. I encountered this phenomenon during a recent trip to Belgrade, which is a city full of monuments, busts, historical buildings and plaques, with little public attention paid to the damage done during World War II. Jewishness, as a public presence, is notable by its absence, though there is still an old and active synagogue in the city.

Tsing is an oblique study of these postwar outcomes. It is a poetic account of a writer's life, some which is autobiographical, and it is a rumination on the relationship between a father and son, played out on an international stage in Belgrade, Tel Aviv and Zurich.

The novella's most compelling character is the writer's declining father, who is presented as a personality marked by the particular catastrophe that befell him: "For him, like so many people who survived, time began after the war. The war camp was a kind of womb, a uterus which pushed him into the world; into a different world... he regarded the things that happened before the war as if they had not happened, no, as if they had happened in a dream... Belgrade, Péc, Cuprija, Zemun: the circle was closed."

The short sections the narrator dedicates to mining his father's postwar life are evocative of a certain evasive resignation I encountered amongst Serbs, with regard to both the recent conflict and the much more distant disasters of the World War II. Some of this may be accounted for by the ongoing process of cultural renewal that should have begun in earnest with the collapse of Soviet influence in the region, but was held up by the mystifications and braggadocio of the Milosevic years.

Albahari presents his narrator's father as a Representative Man, a figure who in key ways encapsulates the troubles of his homeland. And it is the father's embrace by history that leaves the son at remove from these things, diffident and guilty. "He lived through four wars," Albahari writes, "four years in German captivity, the loss of his first wife and children, while I worry because of my thinning hair and my bad teeth."

Norman Ravvin's novel, Lola by Night, was recently released in Serbian translation. He chairs the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

SECOND SHOW ADDED FOR 13-YEAR-OLD SINGING SENSATION NIKKI YANOFSKY

Luminato and TD Canada Trust Toronto Jazz Festival have added a second show for 13-year-old Montreal singing sensation Nikki Yanofsky after her first scheduled show was sold out within hours of the tickets being released for sale here in Toronto.

Yanofsky seems to be entrusted with a talent as large as Ella Fitzgerald's. Her repertoire includes a highly sophisticated version of Fitzgerald's classic A Tisket A Tasket and other jazz standards. Several tracks are available for free download from Yanofsky's website (www.nikkionline.ca).

She performs at the Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St., on Feb. 5 and 6; tickets are still available for the latter concert. Ticketmaster, 416-870-8000 or www.ticketmaster.ca.

Film Sundays with Shlomo Schwartzberg: The topic is "Drastic Changes: The '60s and '70s" in this continuing series on how Jewish filmmakers have depicted the Jewish image in the movies over the years. Film clips, bagels and coffee. Admission $9. Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Feb. 3, 11 a.m. to 12:30 p.m.

Book Launch: The Latner Jewish Library presents the launch of Living Legacies: A Collection of Inspirational enber. The moderator is Susan Jackson, the executive director of the Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage. Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St. Sunday, Feb. 3, 2 to 4 p.m. RSVP, 416-635-2883, ext. 111, or by e-mail to lnobel@ujafed.org.

Klezmer Concerts: The Flying Bulgars perform two 20th anniversary concerts. Tickets are $24 in advance, $30 at the door, $15 for young people up to age 14. Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal JCC. Saturday, Feb. 9, 8 p.m. and Sunday, Feb. 10, 7:30 p.m. 416-924-6211, ext. 0. (Phone order service charge applies.)

Golden Globes & Oscars: Jewish winners of the recent Golden Globe awards included Daniel Day-Lewis, who won the best dramatic actor award for his role in There Will Be Blood. Day-Lewis is the son of British Jewish actress Jill Balcon. His wife, Rebecca, is the daughter of the late playwright Arthur Miller.

David Duchovny, star of the adult sitcom Californication, was selected best actor in a musical or comedy series. (Duchovny's father is Jewish.)

Other Jewish winners included Julian Schnabel, director of The Diving Bell and the Butterfly, and brothers Ethan and Joel Coen, who won best screenplay for the thriller No Country for Old Men. Hollywood icon Steven Spielberg was to be honoured with the Cecil B. DeMille Award, but the presentation was postponed to next year due to the writer's strike.

Also on the subject of film honours, two films with Jewish themes were nominated for Academy Awards for best foreign language film. The Israeli film Beaufort and the Austrian film The Counterfeiters were among five films nominated in that category.

Beaufort, directed by Joseph Cedar, is a war movie about a small Israeli unit that evacuates the medieval Beaufort fortress during the first Lebanon War. According to the JTA, the film has stirred controversy in Israel because several actors in the cast did not serve in the military.

In The Counterfeiters by Stefan Ruzowitzky, the Nazis round up dozens of skilled Jewish craftsmen from concentration camps to create counterfeit British and U.S. currency in a last-ditch ploy to wreck the economies of the two allies.

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival's Chai Tea & A Movie program presents a screening of The Counterfeiters at the Sheppard Grande Cinema, Yonge and Sheppard, Sunday, Feb. 24, tea 4 p.m., film 5 p.m. $15 at the door or in advance. 416-324-9121, www.tjff.com

Contemporary European Drama: The University of Toronto Graduate Centre for Study of Drama presents the Canadian premiere of German playwright Roland Schimmelpfennig's Boulevard of the Brave (Auf der Greifswalder Strasse). Translated into English for the first time, the play explores the nature of fate and chance, and the little things that momentarily bring us together. For 24 hours, the lives of 37 people who live on a low-income street in Berlin intersect in seemingly banal and accidental ways.

"Through his signature dramaturgy of laconic, hyper-realistic snapshots, magic realism, fairy tale and prose narrative, Schimmelpfennig leads the spectator's gaze abruptly back and forth between the two sides of one loud and ugly street - unexpectedly spanning generations bound together by this neighbourhood of the forgotten."

Theodore Bikel to perform at Ashkenaz Festival fundraiser

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Famed actor and singer of screen and stage, Theodore Bikel, will be back in Toronto after a 20-year absence.

The 83-year-old Jewish performer and icon is returning to promote the Ashkenaz Foundation – a community non-profit dedicated to creating increased awareness of Yiddish and Jewish culture through the performing arts – and to “get everything I need by riding up and down Bathurst Street again,” he told The C/JN last week. “I’m very fond of Toronto.”

Speaking from his home in southern California, Bikel explained that while the billing for his Feb. 2 appearance at the Toronto Centre for the Arts states he’s been away for two decades, in fact he was here about 11 years ago as part of a troupe performing Fiddler on the Roof.

This isn’t surprising, considering he’s performed the lead role, Tevye, in the play more than 2,000 times over the course of his storied career. Despite this, he never tires of it, he said.

“If you have any sense of artistic integrity it doesn’t get tiring,” Bikel stated, adding that as a professional artist, “you can’t just have the semblance of newness to the [role]... you actually have to bring something new to it.”

When asked how it feels to still be performing as an octogenarian, Bikel responded enthusiastically.

“It feels no different than it has in the past. My voice is as strong as it ever was,” he said.

Perhaps the only difference, he said, is in his world outlook and his refined experience.

“I’ve lived longer and have more insights into what role culture plays in society [and] that I’m not performing in a vacuum. When you’re 22, you perform, but you don’t define what it is you’re doing,” he said. “Now, whether it’s connected to my links as a Jew and as a human... you look to yesterday to pinpoint where you are today.”

So what can local audiences expect from Bikel after all this time?

“I’ve added a lot of material since I last came to Toronto, a lot of ethnic stuff. All that will be there,” he said.

But far from being a one-note, Jewish performer, Bikel has appeared in numerous projects across artistic genres, with more than 35 film roles and dozens of appearances on TV, including stints on popular shows Law and Order, All in The Family, L.A. Law and JAG.

Interestingly, Bikel has also become somewhat of a science-fiction icon for his portrayal of the hard-nosed Sergey Rozhenko, human adoptive parent of Worf, everybody’s favourite Klingon on Star Trek: The Next Generation.

“Yes. I still get trekkie [mail],” Bikel quipped when reminded about the role. “I guess the producers liked my read. I just tried to read the part as a human... because I don’t know what an alien looks like or sounds like. I played what I projected into the role. So they cast me.”

Despite the long list of screen credits, Bikel still prefers performing live.

“It’s the live contact with the audience,” he said. “In the studio, you’re working for a reaction that may or may not come months later when the thing is released.”

Actress’ monologue aims to help abused women

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The C/JN

When Israeli-American actress and activist Naomi Ackerman was asked to write a 20-minute monologue 10 years ago, she never anticipated the journey she’d be taking.

“While working as an actress in Israel – my family made aliyah when I was nine – the Ministry of Welfare in Jerusalem approached me to write this piece, a one-time gig on domestic violence,” Ackerman said over the phone from New York, where she was giving a performance.

Interviewing women at a government shelter heightened her awareness of abuse victims.

“I went into the women’s shelter thinking this could never happen to me. I knew there was domestic violence in the Jewish world, but I was shocked that I identified with them, even though no one ever raised a hand to me in my life,” she said.

Weaving together the stories of four women, Ackerman wrote Flowers Aren’t Enough, a poignant portrayal of Michal, a young woman from an upper-middle-class family who is in an abusive relationship.

After her performance, one of the four came up and said, “You’ve got it Naomi! Now go and tell the world.”

From then on the monologue became a work in progress.

“The first 20 minutes are based on the initial four women, but so many women wrote and spoke to me that the monologue got longer, deeper and wider – from 20 minutes it became one hour,” said Ackerman, a mediator and conflict resolution specialist who promotes tolerance and dialogue through art direction, theatre programming and workshops.

Ackerman took advice from an acquaintance on a Hadassah mission and translated the play from Hebrew into English.

Audience reactions were amazing.

“The minute I performed in English, I started getting invites to the United States, India, Australia – I’ve travelled all over the world and performed it close to a thousand times. I always laugh that I was chosen to do this. Never in my wildest dreams did I intend this to become what it has become. The places I’ve been – it’s incredible.”

There’s one response the acclaimed actress said she gets from every audience. “They don’t want to talk about the cycle of violence

Never shy about his opinion, Bikel, a longtime member of the Actors’ Equity Association, also has his take on the current writer’s strike in the United States.

“The writers have a good cause, but bad negotiation skills,” he said. “There are means of distribution that the producers have that have not been covered by any contract. They refuse to make a deal and that’s nonsense. You can’t just let the producers rake in the money and not share it.”

Proceeds from Bikel’s Toronto concert will help fund this summer’s Ashkenaz Festival.

“I’m connected with Jewish festivals all over the world... and [the Ashkenaz Festival] seeks to cultivate a cultural environment that is not otherwise covered. So I agreed to help raise the necessary funds to support it,” Bikel proudly stated.

Musical chronicles compelling family history

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL

Special to The C/JN

Growing up Jewish in small-town Ontario can be quite a colourful journey.

Just ask Allan Merovitz. The actor, singer and raconteur is parlaying memories of his formative years in Smiths Falls, Ont., into a family friendly musical.

Titled If Cows Could Fly, the production is rich with dialogue and a wide range of music genres, including Yiddish songs, country ballads, klezmer hits and even Ottawa Valley fiddle tunes.

"I am very excited about this production," says Merovitz, a two-time Dora Award winner.

"There is so much music and it's integrated in such a beautiful way."

The show, produced by Artword Theatre and Barry Karp, will be presented in Hamilton in mid-February and will run in Ottawa in February and March.

If Cows Could Fly traces the story of both sides of Merovitz's family, which left eastern Europe in the early 20th century seeking a better life in the new world.

Along with chronicling Merovitz's compelling family history and odyssey to Canada, the play touches on a common theme for many Jewish immigrants, namely, the challenges of holding onto age-old traditions in the face of modernity.

"What does If Cows Could Fly mean?" Merovitz asks rhetorically.

"It means making the impossible tangible. How do we do this? Through a belief in ourselves and in the generosity of so many people who help us along the way. Music is a way to express this and have a good time. We smile, we laugh, we sing, we dance."

Born in Montreal, the 65-year-old Merovitz was raised in Smiths Falls, a small town that was not exactly a bastion of Jewish culture. Nevertheless, Merovitz's relatives ensured he was imbued with strong Jewish sensibilities.

The father of four notes his family members often spoke about their history, and he was deeply moved by the stories they regaled.

"So I started interviewing all of my relatives," he says.

"They told wonderful stories of where they came from, why they left and that really got me rolling."

As he compiled a compendium of their tales, Merovitz started to create characters based on them as well as interspersing these tales with Yiddish songs and other forms of music.

"I started to share this with my theatre friends, and eventually, I had so much material that I was able to put together a show. I staged little pieces for friends in their homes and art galleries, and in time I took the show to fringe festivals."

Merovitz will also appear in the production alongside renowned musicians' Henri Oppenheim, Frank Rackow and Ronald Weihs, who is also the director.

"This play... runs the gamut from wacky, to fascinating, to deeply moving," says Weihs.

"It's a kaleidoscope, always full of surprises. Most of all, it's about tolerance and understanding between people from different backgrounds."

A veteran of the arts, Merovitz was a former lead singer with the Juno-nominated Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and currently leads his own band in Calgary, KlezMerovitz, which has recently released a self-titled CD.

The band is working on a new CD release in 2008, titled The Wedding Bard/Der Badchan.

Hamilton performances of If Cows Could Fly will be held at the DAC Downtown Arts Centre on Feb. 15 and 16. For tickets, call 905-543-8512.

The Irving Greenberg Theatre Centre in Ottawa hosts the production from Feb. 21 to March 9. For tickets, contact the box office at 613-236-5196.

Sharon Azrieli to perform in Israel Opera production

By JANICE ARNOLD

Staff Reporter

Sharon Azrieli will die on stage in March, and she can hardly wait.

The Montreal opera singer will sing a leading role in Puccini's Turandot with the New Israel Opera in the 1,600-seat Golda Meir Centre for the Performing Arts.

Azrieli is playing Liù, the servant girl who stabs herself in the heart rather than betray the prince she secretly loves in the exotic Chinese tale that would be Puccini's last work. The dramatic death scene is a highlight of the tragedy.

Getting a big part in a lavish classical Italian opera before a major audience is something Azrieli has been striving for since re-starting her career. She took 10 years off after a divorce and to raise her two sons, now 12 and 10.

Now in her early 40s, she resettled in 2000 in her native city after living in New York since her college days.

"I'm an overnight success that took 20 years," Azrieli quipped.

She leaves for Israel Feb. 7 to begin rehearsals for the opening March 13 of Turandot.

Azrieli has loved opera and singing generally since childhood, and credits her Grade 4 choirmaster, the late Yehuda Vineberg, at Solomon Schechter Academy with recognizing her talent early on.

"He always gave me the solos," she said.

She and her mother, Stephanie, regularly tuned in to Saturday Afternoon at the Opera, and Israeli music was a family favourite.

However, she didn't consider singing as a career until she spent a summer abroad in Europe while she was an art history student at Vassar College. She visited Florence and became enthralled with all things Italian. She studied with the late acclaimed baritone Gino Becchi.

After graduating from Vassar, she tried for three years to be admitted to the prestigious Juilliard School, finally passing its rigorous audition.

Among her early roles was the heroine in the Canadian Opera Company's production of Romeo and Juliet, Elvira in Mozart's Don Giovanni at the Vermont Opera Festival, the soprano solo in Verdi's Requiem with the New West Symphony in Los Angeles, and Susanna in Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro with the Sarasota Opera. She has also performed with a number of orchestras around the world.

Azrieli said she has never suffered from stage fright, and, in fact, feels more comfortable performing in a large hall than at a cocktail party or in a lounge.

Her voice has matured from her early years when she was a lyrical soprano. She is now a spinto soprano which makes her suited to the "juicier parts" she craves, such as the full-blooded ladies in Madama Butterfly, Tosca and Aida, one of her dream title roles.

"Opera singing is an aerobic sport. It takes years of training the muscles and the breathing."

To keep fit, she practises for an hour or two each day and takes Pilates classes, which emphasize breathing correctly and strengthening the body's core.

In addition to opera, she also studied cantorial singing in New York and was the cantor at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Shalom from 2001 to 2003. Sacred music is something dear to her, and she doesn't care what religious tradition it comes from.

She is infatuated with Verdi's Requiem, which she describes as "a thrilling roller-coaster ride."

She has started working on a doctorate at the Université de Montréal that will explore what she believes is the influence of the nusach, or melody, of the Jewish prayer service, on the composition, even though it's a Catholic funeral mass. She has a hunch that Verdi was actually Jewish.

While a master's music student at U de M, she had a solo in a production of Dvorak's Stabat Mater, which is also inspired by the Catholic liturgy.

Azrieli has also soloed in two McGill Chamber Orchestra concerts of works by Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninoff, which are to be released on compact disc. They will be Azrieli's first recordings.

She has just distributed to Israeli radio stations recordings of two original Hebrew pop songs, written for her by Ilana Klein with music by Varda Granot, in hope of getting some air time.

Show raises awareness of abuse in their community. They find excuses and reasons why it's there."

Ackerman brings her one-woman show to Toronto to benefit Miklat Bat Melech ("miklat" is Hebrew for shelter), a network of shelters for abused haredi women in Israel, on Feb. 9 at 8 p.m. at the Terraces of Baycrest, 55 Amers Ave.

After the performance, the actress will answer questions. A kosher dessert reception follows.

Ackerman learned of Miklat, which was founded in 1996, when she was invited to perform at a benefit for the organization in New Rochelle, N.Y., last year.

"I wasn't aware of Miklat's phenomenal work. It's extremely needed. Some people ask why religious women need a different shelter, but others have beds for women with maybe two or three children. These women come with eight or nine kids. The government shelters are kosher, but not what these women require," she said.

"Miklat helps women go back to their community or gets them legal help from someone who understands where they're coming from. They help and don't ask questions," Ackerman added. "In Israel, if an abused woman needs legal aid, the government won't assist if she has assets in her name. One of the biggest issues is their husbands cut off financial aid. Although women may have money, they don't have access to it."

What makes Miklat special for Ackerman is that it also has Nigunim, a shelter for teenage girls.

"There's really nowhere for [haredi] girls to go when they're in trouble, being abused or sexually assaulted. Having a house gives them a future," says Ackerman, who works extensively with Israeli girls at risk. "It's such a joy to do a show that raises awareness and money for an organization in Israel that I truly believe in. It's a double mitzvah for me."

Flowers Aren't Enough will also be performed at Beth Tzedek Congregation on March 26.

For more information, visit www.naomiacckerman.com or www.miklat.org.

The Feb. 9 Miklat event is $36. A tax receipt will be issued. For tickets, contact the Toronto Miklat Committee at miklat.toronto@gmail.com.

Israelis win Grand Slam event

JTA

MELBOURNE, Australia — Andy Ram and Yoni Erlich have become the first Israeli doubles team to win a Grand Slam tennis title.

The pair, seeded eighth, defeated the seventh-seeded French duo of Arnaud Clement and Michael Llodra in the Australian Open final in Melbourne last weekend.

Ram has won two mixed doubles Grand Slam titles, but never with an Israeli partner.

"It's a great day for us, for our family, for Israel, for everybody," Ram said, noting that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert had already called the pair to congratulate them. "He left a message for us to call him back; he couldn't reach us."

Hundreds of flag-waving Israelis were in the crowd, including Israel's ambassador to Australia, Yuval Rotem, who travelled with his staff from Canberra for the match.

The Israelis, who did not drop a set in the tournament, earned $393,211 (all figures US) for their victory.

Earlier in the tournament, Shahar Peer had become the first Israeli female to reach a Grand Slam final, but she lost in three sets with her partner, Victoria Azarenka of Belarus.

Peer and Azarenka went down to defeat in three sets despite taking the first set convincingly, 6-2.

"I'm disappointed, but I'm excited to be in my first final" of a Grand Slam tennis event, Peer said after the match.

Earlier last week, Peer, 20, was eliminated in the third round of the singles tournament by Russian Elena Dementieva.

Despite her brush with history in the Australian Open, Peer is poised to break another barrier by becoming the first Israeli tennis player to compete in the Arab nation of Qatar.

Peer confirmed she will compete in the Qatar Open from Feb. 18 to 24, while Ram and Erlich are considering a Dubai tournament along with another Israeli, Tzipi Obziler.

Last year, Peer was ineligible to enter the $2.5-million tournament in the Persian Gulf state because she was still officially enlisted in the Israeli army.

This year, however, the world's 17th ranked player has no such restrictions.

"I'm really comfortable about" going to Qatar, she said after her second-round victory at the Open. "Doha is a big tournament. I really want to go play tennis. It's a very nice country, and I'll just go there and have fun and do what I need to do."

Canadians travel to Israel who also serves as director of the IGTO. "It is an exciting time for Israel as we enter 2008 and begin preparations to celebrate Israel's 60th anniversary. Canadians of all religions, cultures and ethnic backgrounds are booking to visit Israel."

Grofman said Israel has embarked on a large marketing campaign to increase tourism. About $12 million (all figures US) was invested in the North American market last year, $1 million of which was allocated to Canada. The marketing and advertising budget is expected to rise to $1.2 million in 2008. Grofman expects 2008 to mark a new record for Canadian visitors — 70,000.

Police kibbitzed at hearing

Henry Gimpel, a past lodge president and chair of B'nai Brith's Toronto regional co-ordinating committee, who is also facing expulsion, said he knew of no efforts to bring people to the hearing. Supporters were annoyed that they were not permitted to view the hearing.

Gimpel said he joked with the off-duty police, who were paid by the hour, saying, "What do you expect from older people, to fight, to burn down the building?"

He called their presence "a waste of money."

When contacted by The C/JN for a comment, B'nai Brith Canada responded with a written statement, reproduced on page 5.

Mosaic Outdoor Club heading for Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Mosaic Outdoor Club of Ontario is taking its show on the road.

From May 12 to 21, as many as 30 devotees of the outdoor life will hike, bike and camp in Israel – miles away from their usual stomping grounds in southern Ontario.

The Israel trip is being organized in conjunction with the Jewish National Fund (JNF), which is handling logistics and accommodations in Israel and providing access to some of the country's more interesting natural sites.

The trip will take participants off the beaten track. They will forgo the usual five-star accommodations associated with JNF missions, in exchange for "an infinite star hotel," camping in the open air, said Lynne Morris, Mosaic's events committee chair.

Participants are expected to be in reasonably good shape to be able to handle the vigorous itinerary. The trip will include swimming, hiking, biking and cooking.

Cooking? On day two of the trip, the participants will be in the Negev Desert, and, to quote the itinerary, they will "wake up and make breakfast."

After breaking camp, the group will climb on board mountain bikes for a trip into the Tzin Valley to the Akev Spring, where they will trade their biking shorts for swim trunks.

The night will be spent at the traditional home of a Bedouin family.

Other trip highlights include a hike in the Mitzpe Ramon Crater, swimming in the Dead Sea, climbing Masada, a walking tour of Jerusalem's Old City, hiking in Gamla (near the Sea of Galilee) and overnight stays in the Kibbutz Hagoshrim guest house.

"It was a natural to partner with the JNF, as they are the primary charity protecting and improving the parks and environments' infrastructure" in Israel, Morris said.

Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF Toronto, agreed that hosting a Mosaic mission was "a natural fit. The proposed trip encompasses nature and an appreciation of nature."

JNF, he continued, plays an important role in keeping Israel green, developing aqua culture, planting trees, conserving the environment and preserving Israel's flora and fauna.

"They're going to see rural Israel" as well as cities and villages, he said.

The Mosaic mission is quite a departure from the usual JNF missions from Canada, though JNF offices in Britain and Australia have sponsored similar outdoor trips, Prossin said. "We hope this is something that may be held biannually."

Morris said the club, which is active all year round, "felt we wanted to do something more meaningful" than its regular hiking and cycling tours around Ontario and the United States. "We have a number of Israelis in the club who said there are great outdoor activities in Israel. Let's do that... The fact it corresponds to Israel's 60th anniversary is serendipity," she said.

Her friend Mitchell Shnier, who is involved with JNF, suggested linking with the environmental organization. So far, 17 people have committed to participate and as many as 30 can be accommodated, Morris said.

Information evenings have been held to publicize the trip. The next one is scheduled for Feb. 19.

Cost is $1,450, which covers the land portion of the mission, not including gratuities and some meals. Air fare is an additional $1,300. Prossin said a somewhat longer JNF mission runs around $4,900.

Inside Back

Some of the seniors working at Yad LaKashish in Jerusalem are from the former Soviet Union: from left are metalworker Immanuel Lukatzki, Boris Guyber painting a violin on silk and Luba Krushentzki putting the finishing touches on a delicate silk scarf. The program serves olim from several countries.

Program provides a 'lifeline for the old'

By MICHAEL GORDON

The physicians and dentists on the seventh annual UJA Federation of Greater Toronto medical mission last year were greeted by a man who introduced himself this way: "I am a retired professor of anthropology. Rather than pursuing something in my field when I made aliyah, I decided to volunteer in a pursuit I loved all my life - woodworking. It has marvelously fulfilled my dreams and ambitions."

He was doing his woodworking in a workshop for seniors in Jerusalem called Yad LaKashish (Lifeline for the Old), a program that has provided supportive employment for seniors and people with disabilities for more than 40 years.

There are sheltered workshops in Canada, and there are arts and crafts programs in many organizations, including Baycrest. People on the tour with me asked if I knew of any programs like the one we were visiting. I could not recall any of this nature in Toronto or elsewhere in Ontario or Canada that provide a support system with financial, social, linguistic and community interventions as part of their mandate.

As a nation of immigrants, Israel absorbs individuals from countries around the world. Many of the elderly immigrants face enormous educational and language challenges, and it's very important to have a place where they can go and feel valued. Social networks and a sense of belonging have been shown to be crucial to older people in helping them maintain their physical and emotional well-being.

We met immigrants from the former Soviet Union who spoke rudimentary Hebrew, but I was able to communicate with them using my very rusty Yiddish. A big smile spread across the face of an elderly woman when I commended her work in Yiddish as she ironed silk-screened scarves and challah covers.

Elderly Ethiopian immigrants coloured greeting cards and put the finishing touches on tallitot, using skills they knew from their home country. In another room, men were finely painting gift boxes and wooden plaques, while in the room supervised by the retired anthropologist, people were using power tools to produce scrolled napkin rings.

What is unique about this program is the concept of providing a place for older people to go to avoid loneliness, while at the same time, providing a way to be productive, earn some money, and receive a range of social services and one very welcome robust hot meal a day.

Innovative and creative programs like Yad LaKashish can be a model to be explored by organizations that care for elderly Canadians. Such a program might provide an incentive for them to take part in their new world through companionship and a reason to get up and go someplace where they can contribute something useful.

The Senior Side of Life

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenty of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

APPLE CINNAMON QUICHE

Ingredients

Serves 6

- 2 apples, peeled and sliced
- 8 oz grated cheddar cheese
- 1 unbaked 10-inch pastry shell
- 1 1/2 c whipping cream
- 2 Tbsps butter
- 1 Tbsp sugar
- 1 tsp cinnamon
- 4 large eggs

Directions

Sauté apples in butter for 5 minutes. Sprinkle sugar and cinnamon over apples. Layer apples in pastry shell. Sprinkle cheese over apple mixture. In medium size bowl, lightly whisk together the eggs and whipping cream. Pour over the apple/cheese mixture. Bake in a preheated 375° oven for 35 minutes or until set. Serve warm.

Knowledge empowers its user

Epi on Education

On the advice of a colleague, I recently read Three Cups of Tea by Greg Mortenson and David Oliver Relin. I highly recommend this wonderful account of Mortenson's astounding achievement in building schools in Pakistan and Afghanistan.

A mountaineer who failed an attempt at K2, ending up in a tiny isolated village where he was inspired to begin his school-building career, Mortenson promoted education and literacy for girls and boys in the very territory that spawned the Taliban. The radical difference between his passion for a liberating, yet respectful, education and the Taliban's desire to dominate through ignorance and force is a testimony to the power of the pen over that of the sword, or the computer versus the gun.

I was reminded of the work of Paulo Freire in Brazil, where he, too, chose the written word and articulate speech to be his weapons against oppression. (See his Pedagogy of the Oppressed.)

In both cases, there is also a message for Jewish education.

Knowledge liberates. It's no accident that the Exodus from the slavery and persecution of Egypt had to be quickly followed by the giving of the Torah at Sinai.

Instruction (Torah) leads to deep knowledge and literacy in a tradition and culture, and that same knowledge empowers its owner. The illiterate, the less literate, and the illiterate (those who can read, but don't) can only fumble for words. They have no basis for their identity and can't stand up to those in power. In Jewish life, the more literate you are, the more you appreciate the richness and depth of our heritage, and the more you can deliberate your way through life as a proud and courageous Jew.

We are named Yisrael because we should be able to struggle even with God.

But we can't enter that life-long dialectic if we are bereft of the proper letters and words to express ourselves. Jewish literacy has always been our source of strength and pride. As Zechariah tells us in chapter 4, "... not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, says the Lord."

Seymour Epstein

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

By AVRUM ROSENZWEIG

Have you ever been hungry? Have you ever gone without a meal, not because you wanted to but because you had to? Do you know what it feels like to be starving, not because it's a fast day but because you only have two nickels in your pocket to rub together, enough perhaps to buy a stick of licorice?

In our hometown of Toronto, thousands of children wake up every morning, and lay their tired heads down at night, hungry.

What a painful reality.

Consider the following facts found on the website of Mazon Canada (which describes itself as the "Jewish response to hunger" - mazoncanada.ca): 140,000 people in the Toronto area use food relief programs, and the percentage of food recipients who go hungry at least a couple days a week is 36 per cent. The number of children in food bank households is 50,400, and the number of children who go hungry at least once a month is 18,497.

The federal government made a commitment in 1989 to end child poverty by 2000. But by 2003, children were still the most notable victims of poverty-related hunger. Unfortunately, the chances of ending child poverty in the next decade are as good as the Toronto Maple Leafs' winning a Stanley Cup in 2008.

Hunger is indeed a serious problem, both here in Toronto and across Canada. According to Mazon, almost one million Canadians receive emergency food hampers each month, a figure that has risen 122 per cent since 1989 (and 8.5 per cent since 2003). Even more disappointing is that of these food bank recipients, 40 per cent are children - 317,242 to be precise, 166,242 more than in 1989. Mazon adds that "there are far more hungry Canadians than these numbers indicate."

Ask any teacher for the signs of a hungry child. Ask your child's teacher. He or she will tell you that hungry children can suffer from anxiety, depression, social problems and/or attention problems. The National Research Council and the Institute of Medicine in the United States have conducted studies that show children who suffer from malnutrition have lower IQs and "score worse than their peers on arithmetic, writing, spatial memory and other cognitive tests."

It's crucial that we become aware of this devastating problem that's going on all around us. The thought that a little child is hungry in the morning, or has no lunch in his or her bag is heart-breaking.

Your gut response in reading this sad news might be to say that these facts reflect bad situations in Regent Park or near Jane and Finch. The earth-shattering reality, however, is that they also reflect a problem that affects many of our children, some of whom attend Jewish day schools. Poverty exists inside and outside the Jewish community.

Fred, the fellow who put flowers where David Rosenzweig was killed a few years ago, told me that he would frequently be asked by young children at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue if he could buy them a burger or something else to eat, because they hadn't eaten that day. They were hungry. Child poverty is everywhere and pays no attention to religion or culture.

How can you help? Familiarize yourself with the problem. Some important websites include www.campaign2000.ca and www.ncjwc.org, the site of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJWC).

Then consider supporting organizations such as Mazon and NCJWC in their quest to help eradicate child hunger and poverty. Join with them. Play a role in strengthening our community and city by ensuring that our members, be they five or 85, are cared for, in accordance with Midrash Psalms 118:17: "When you are asked in the world to come, 'What was your work?' and you answer, 'I fed the hungry,' you will be told, 'This is the gate of the Lord, enter into it, you who have fed the hungry.'"

The News in Brief

CANADA

Eager For Trial

REGINA — A Regina man charged with promoting hatred against Jews on the web told CBC last week he wants to air his views in court. Terry Tremaine, 59, a former math instructor at the University of Saskatchewan, was charged last month after a complaint from Canadian Jewish Congress and Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman. Tremaine was also fined last year by a human rights tribunal after a complaint by Warman. In a Jan. 28 interview, Tremaine said he wants all Jews to leave Canada, calling them "a destructive force."

WJC Praises Ottawa

JERUSALEM — The World Jewish Congress passed a resolution praising Canada for its "bold" stance on the Durban conference. Canada said last month it won't attend the second UN anti-racism conference in South Africa next year out of concern it will stir up anti-Semitism. The WJC, whose board met Jan. 29 in Israel, commended Ottawa for "its bold action in calling the world's attention to the corrupted Durban Review Conference process." The 2001 conference featured a resolution equating Zionism with racism and a series of protests against Israel. Members of Jewish groups who attended an accompanying conference for non-governmental groups said they were heckled.

Cotler Honoured

NEW YORK — Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler received the prestigious Pursuit of Justice Award from the American Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists on Jan. 27 at Yeshiva University's Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law. Cotler is the first Canadian to receive the award. Previous winners include U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg and former Israeli Supreme Court justice Aharon Barak. In presenting the prize, Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz revealed that he has nominated Cotler for the Nobel Peace Prize.

WORLD

More Iranian Threats

TEHRAN — Iranian President Mahmoud

Ahmadinejad predicted the imminent collapse of Israel. In a televised speech Jan. 30 in the port city of Bushehr, where Russia delivered the last of the uranium needed to start up Iran's first nuclear power plant, Ahmadinejad told Israel's friends to "stop supporting the Zionists, as [their] regime reached its final stage... Accept that the life of Zionists will sooner or later come to an end." London's Daily Telegraph quoted him as saying, "The ones who still support the criminal Zionists should know that the occupiers' days are numbered." Ahmadinejad has publicly threatened the destruction of Israel many times since becoming Iran's president in 2005. He has also referred to the Holocaust as a "myth."

Deportation Closer

CLEVELAND — A U.S. federal appeals court rejected accused Nazi death camp guard John Demjanjuk's challenge of a final deportation order by a former chief U.S. immigration judge. The court said Jan. 30 that the 2005 order to deport him to Ukraine, his birthplace, is still valid. His lawyers say he may face prosecution or torture if deported. Demjanjuk was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 1981 and extradited to Israel, where he was acquitted in 1993 of being the Treblinka guard "Ivan the

Holocaust Attorney Seeks Interest Payment

NEW YORK — A lawyer who sparked outrage over his multimillion-dollar fees for a Holocaust reparations case has demanded interest.

In papers filed last week, Burt Neuborne, a New York University law professor, said he is due an extra $300,000 (US) because two years have elapsed since he originally filed for his fee. Last month, a U.S. federal judge ordered that he be paid $3.1 million for his work. The additional request is based on an interest calculation of 4.72 per cent.

Neuborne's original fee request of $4.76 million provoked outrage among Holocaust survivors. Critics said Neuborne is not only being greedy but had led survivors to believe he was working pro-bono on the case. He countered that he did indeed work for free to win the original settlement, $1.25 billion from Swiss banks accused of profiting from the deposits of the Nazis' victims, but not for his later years of work administering the settlement.

Sam Dubbin, a Miami lawyer representing several survivors who objected to the original fee request, has written to the court opposing the interest payment.

Terrible" by its Supreme Court. He was stripped of his citizenship again in 2002 based on new evidence he was a guard at another camp. In December 2006, his appeal to have a deportation order overturned was dismissed. His lawyer said the next step is an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

next door. None were Israeli. The attackers shouted "God is Great" before opening fire. Mauritania is one of only three Arab nations with full diplomatic ties with Israel. Western intelligence agencies recently have identified an Al Qaeda cell in the country.

Shabbat For Israel

NEW YORK — The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist leaders have declared a Sabbath for Israel to mark the state's 60th birthday. Shuls will celebrate Shabbat Israel May 9 to 11.

NOUAKCHOTT — Gunmen opened fire outside Israel's embassy in Mauritania early last Friday in Nouakchott, the Arab nation's capital. No one was killed, but one to three people were wounded, apparently revellers at a nightclub

Darchei Noam moves into its reconstructed home

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Congregation Darchei Noam's new building was filled with music, dancing, and an estimated 500 people for the dedication of the synagogue's first permanent home on Jan. 27, following a one-kilometre Torah procession from its previous rented premises.

After 34 years of existence, Toronto's only Reconstructionist congregation has moved into an attractive Jerusalem stone-clad building at 864 Sheppard Ave. W. that is barely recognizable as the former Adath Sholom Synagogue, a congregation that merged with Beth Tikvah Synagogue in 2005.

Darchei Noam, which had been meeting in the B'nai Brith Canada building on Hove Street since 1989, purchased Adath Sholom's four-decade-old building in 2005 and raised $6.4 million to renovate and expand it.

The building now has a two-storey entrance with large south-facing windows and a multi-coloured donor wall designed by glass artist Alfred Engerer – one of a number of examples of new artwork in the building. It also boasts barrier-free access to all three levels, a teen lounge with a magnetic floor-to-ceiling chalkboard, and a new sanctuary on a second floor that was added to the building. The former sanctuary of Adath Sholom, with its original stained-glass windows, is now the building's social hall.

The congregation's initially more modest plans were given a substantial boost by philanthropist Leslie Dan, who with his wife Anna donated $3.2 million.

Rabbi Tina Grimberg, the congregation's spiritual leader, praised Dan's "philanthropic, warm, all-encompassing embrace regardless of affiliation," referring in part to significant funding he has also provided for Orthodox and Reform congregations.

Dan, who had no previous ties to the synagogue, told the assembled group that he had been impressed by the "participation, dynamism [and] vitality" he witnessed when he attended a Darchei Noam Shabbat service after being approached by a small delegation. He also lauded the "warmth, knowledge, and spiritual depth" of Rabbi Grimberg, and said he found the congregation intellectually stimulating and spiritually vibrant.

Mitchell Rothman, a past president of Congregation Darchei Noam, holds a Torah before placing it in the ark in the synagogue's new building. Lisa Charendoff, current president, looks on.

For all those reasons he felt the proposed plans should be "much larger, more elaborate, more attractive and have more facilities for expansion and growth."

Robert Barkin, president of the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation, cited Darchei Noam as a "beautiful example" of the JRF's mission of fostering "transformative Judaism for the 21st century."

"What could be more 21st century than constructing a building with solar panels?" he asked. "Every aspect of your building is built with the concept of being good shepherds for all that God has given us."

The culmination of the campaign to spread anti-Israel calumny on campus was this week with the oxymoronically named program called Israel Apartheid Week.

The zealots who strive to bring about the demise of the Jewish state were in their glory. They knew they would openly revel in the dissemination of factless, though dangerous, drivel and even find curious clusters of students attracted to their twisted message like agitated moths to yellow light.

The phenomenon of Israel Apartheid Week was the natural outgrowth of years of unceasing distortions and defamations about Israel that began first in the international arenas of the United Nations and in a cadre of NGOs and then, sadly, spread to the halls of the academy.

Israel Apartheid Week is, simply, the poisoned fruit of an ugly, twisted tree.

Prof. Martin Lockshin, a frequent contributor to The C.J.N., the former director of the Jewish studies program at York University in Toronto, has commented on these uncomfortable campus atmospheres wrought by the hardcore anti-Israel polemicists. In the December 2007 issue of Jewish Studies, he wrote, "There are professors on Canadian campuses who take advantage of their positions to bash Israel in their classrooms. This makes the work atmosphere unpleasant (and, even worse, makes the study atmosphere for Jewish and Zionist students very difficult). It also betrays the larger mission of the university and poses obstacles to students seeking understanding of the genuine complexities of the contemporary Middle East."

How the academies of higher learning became one of the driving engines of public hostility to Israel is ably discussed in Academics Against Israel and the Jews, edited by Manfred Gerstenfeld, released last year by the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

The book, therefore, is particularly relevant this week.

It contains 18 essays written by scholars from four different continents. Of special interest to Canadian readers are the essays The Canadian Campus Scene, by Alain Goldshlager, and Anti-Israel Activity at Concordia University, 2000-2003, by Corinne

From the editor's desk

Berzon.

Goldshlager, the director of the Holocaust Literature Research Institute and professor of French at the University of Western Ontario, has written a brief survey of the state of anti-Semitism on Canadian campuses.

Berzon, a former Montrealer, MA candidate in political philosophy at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, chronicles with exacting detail the startling context at Concordia University for the ugly violence that led to former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's being unable to address a student audience there in 2002.

In his sparkling and incisive foreword to the work, former Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky posits his thesis of the test of the "three Ds" (Demonization, Double standards against Israel and Delegitimization) to distinguish new anti-Semitism from legitimate criticism of Israel.

"It is anti-Semitism and demonization when comparisons are being made between Israelis and Nazis, or between Palestinian refugee camps and Auschwitz. It is equally anti-Semitic when Israel is singled out by the United Nations for human rights abuses, while the behaviour of major abusers such as China, Iran Cuba and Syria is ignored. Similarly it is anti-Semitism when only Israel's fundamental right to exist - alone among all the people of the world - is questioned."

One of the chief strengths of the book is that it is prescriptive as well as analytical and narrative. Gerstenfeld and various of the authors offer advice and suggestions on how Jews and Israel can defend themselves against this assaultive behaviour.

Gerstenfeld's compilation of essays, however, does not explore the shocking involvement of Israeli-based academics in the campaign against Israel.

Into that gap of information steps a small policy research paper by Shlomo Sharan titled Our Inner Scourge: The Catastrophe of Israeli Academics, published by the Ariel Center for Policy Research.

Sharan is professor emeritus of educational and organizational psychology at the School of Education, Tel Aviv University.

He minces no words in this hard-hitting tract and explains why he undertook what must have been for him, particularly unpleasant research.

"The role of the anti-Zionist academics in moulding Israel's youth cannot be discounted. It is crucial that their opinions meet with serious counter-efforts on behalf of all Jews who value the existence and significance of Israel as a Jewish nation."

It is this very purpose, namely, to counter the efforts of all individuals who are opposed to the idea of the existence of a Jewish state, that binds us all in our labours on behalf of Israel.

Suggested related reading: The Uncivil University, by Gary A. Tobin, Aryeh K. Weinberg and Jenna Ferer, the Institute For Jewish and Community Research, San Francisco.

The authors examine the ideology and expression of both anti-Semitism and anti-Israelism on campuses in the United States. The book details how the propagandists perpetuate their vile attitudes on campus. They point out the alarming extent to which intimidation and threats against Jewish students and faculty have become acceptable. MBD

Rabbi speaks out against domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After two of his congregants approached him over the past year about domestic violence in their homes, Rabbi Sean Gorman of Beth Tzedec Congregation decided he needed to learn more about the issue.

"I called Jewish Family & Child as well as Jewish Women International and said 'I need to get smart,'" he said in an interview at his synagogue office.

He attended a conference in Baltimore, Md., read books about domestic violence in general and within the Jewish community in particular, and learned how rabbis can help deal with the issue, he said.

As well, he has spoken about domestic violence twice from the bimah.

"My angle is that it exists in our city, and that Beth Tzedec will be a safe place for women to turn."

The statistics are frightening, he said. "In 2005, 1,050 men, women and children passed through the doors of Jewish Family & Child seeking help in abusive situations. That averages out to three times a day, every day.

"Women are victims of abuse at a rate 16 times that of men, and Jewish women live with abuse at the same rate – 15 to 20 per cent – as the national population. That means if there are 200 women [sitting in the Beth Tzedec sanctuary], approximately 30 suffer at the hands of their husbands."

The issues that domestic violence present are beyond his training, he said, "but I can be a gatekeeper. My goal is to receive women, listen to them, refer them and then follow through. It is a very big deal for women to know that they can come here [and be heard]."

Domestic violence manifests itself in many ways, he said, but it is definitely a control problem, not an anger problem.

"Abuse is defined as a means of control, and anger management is not remotely useful. What is useful is for men to learn that spouses and children are meant to be loved and nurtured," Rabbi Gorman said.

"The husband didn't go to work and hit his boss, so we know he can control his anger."

Problems rarely begin with a black eye, he said. "Abuse begins well before in things that on the surface look almost loving. A man may want his wife to call every hour so he can 'hear her voice,' but that is really a control issue in that she has to check in.

"It's OK for him to keep an eye on the chequebook to make sure bills get paid, but it ceases to be OK if she gets an allowance and has no control over the account."

There are many reasons why women stay in abusive relationships, Rabbi Gorman said.

"The psychological torture within these relationships often leaves the woman with such little self-worth that she doesn't have the ability to leave."

The bottom line, he said, is that she should not have to leave. "If a man robs a bank, we don't tell the bank to move to a safer neighbourhood. We try to protect the bank from further incidents. Why in domestic violence do we put the responsibility on the victim to leave?"

When a woman realizes how bad a problem is, she may be presented with the choice of a warm home for her and her children, or being homeless, he said.

Rabbi Gorman said in his sermon that when rabbis talk about kosher kitchens but fail to talk about kosher marriages, "we have neglected our responsibilities to you. When communities fail to provide adequate support for shelters and for social workers, we tell these women they are on their own.

"When communities place the burden of maintaining shalom bayit on the women, the communities by extension also place on those women the blame."

One of the rabbi's roles in dealing with domestic violence is to have phone numbers handy, and to make sure there are flyers in washrooms, and information in bulletins and on synagogue websites, he said.

"And when women come in, we have to believe, believe, believe. Don't say, 'It can't be him.' Never say anything that undercuts what she says. She has taken the strength to say she needs help, and we must help her."

Rabbis also need to talk about domestic violence, he said. "Every time we open our mouths about it, we give a woman a chance to open her mouth."

Rabbi Gorman will speak on a panel at Beth Tzedec about domestic violence on March 26 at 8 p.m., after a performance of Flowers aren't enough, a one-woman show, written and performed by Naomi Ackerman, that tells the story of a young woman from an upper-middle-class family who is in an abusive relationship.

The evening is sponsored by Beth Tzedec, Beth Tzedec Men's Club and Sisterhood, Jewish Family & Child, Jewish Women International and United Synagogue Day School's Bathurst campus.

In related news, a Toronto couple, Lewis and Charlotte Steinberg, have donated $100,000 through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, to the women's abuse program at Jewish Family & Child, to pay for the services of a Russian and Hebrew speaking social worker. Last year – this is the third year the Steinbergs have donated to the initiative – the program served nearly 100 Russian- and Hebrew-speaking women.

"SAY IT WITH TREES"

Celebrate Israel's 60th anniversary and honour those who sacrificed to make it free

Let us stand in solidarity with the people of Israel - Send a message of love and hope

Help make Israel green and beautiful

HELP MAKE ISRAEL GREEN

TU BI'SHEVAT has been celebrated as the New Year of Trees for many centuries. Traditionally, we celebrate by planting trees in Israel.

TU BI'SHEVAT has become known all over the world as THE JNF HOLIDAY. Jewish National Fund organizes many thousands of tree-plantings over the length and breadth of Israel on TU Bi'Shevat.

YOUR TREES WILL BE PLANTED IN ISRAEL WITH THE HELP OF JNF

Plant trees for yourself, your family, your friends or your associates. It is a wonderful way to establish a link with the land and the people of Israel and to show your support. And, you will help make Israel green and beautiful.

Trees are symbols - of hope, of beauty, of strength, of strong roots, of the future, of a love and of a bond with the soil of Israel. Your trees link you with the land and people of Israel.

Celebrate TU BI'SHEVAT by sending your message of love, hope and support to the people of Israel!

Praise and plaudits to our students

A first-time visitor to Israel need only walk down any street in any city, travel in any intra- or inter-urban bus, shop in any mall or local market, read any of the numerous daily newspapers, watch even a few moments of television or sit at any café, to see for himself or herself, that the country is decidedly not an apartheid state.

Israel is very visibly and quite literally a multi-cultural, multi-racial, vibrant democracy. In fact, it is the only democracy in the entire Middle East. This, of course, is the other inconvenient truth that so many people around the globe, and especially, the haters of the very notion of a sovereign Jewish state, prefer to ignore. Sadly, this very patent truth has not been enough to stop dead in its tracks the equally patent, vastly pernicious lie that the Jewish state is an apartheid state.

Indeed, as CJN reporter Sheri Shefa notes in this week's paper, the campaign to perpetuate the apartheid calumny on campuses around North America and beyond appears to be gaining momentum. It is now in its fourth year.

This week, on campuses in Toronto; Montreal; Ottawa; Peterborough, Ont.; New York; Oxford, England; London, England; Johannesburg and, fittingly, Durban, South Africa, a cunning and, it must be said, malicious agglomeration of groups and individuals is peddling tainted propaganda under the perverse banner of Israel Apartheid Week.

The halls, walkways, theatres and public squares of the campuses where the apartheidists scream their anti-Israel hatred cannot be a pleasant place for anyone, let alone for those who believe that it is right and just that there be a state for the Jews too on this earth.

Thus we commend our students. They did not surrender the terrain of their campuses to let falsehoods and lies cling to their fellow students like vines of suffocating ivy to the crevices and fault lines of the masonry. Despite the hostile atmosphere and oppressively noxious climate in which many students found themselves this week, they rose on behalf of the Jewish state. They rose on behalf of truth.

To be sure, a number of different Jewish student organizations fought the apartheid lie. Each organization chose the means appropriate to its own credo and philosophy. For example, a spokesperson for Hillel said that its programming "is trying to take the attention away from the negative activities and put the focus on celebrating Israel and being proud of Israel." A spokesperson for Hasbara Fellowship said, "We want to remove the connection that modern-day students have to the word apartheid and Israel."

Just as an army melds a blend of corps to assert its ultimate strength as a fighting force, so it seems, did the various Jewish student organizations this week.

They deserve our praise and our thanks.

During a visit to Canada by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Egypt and Canada signed an agreement promoting developmental co-operation. It covers economic, technical and related assistance. Mubarak took the opportunity to ask Canada to pressure Israel to stop settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, and to remove all its troops still in Lebanon.

Whitewashing the Liberal record

One would think after reading Bob Rae's letter that the Liberal Party of Canada, for which he is the foreign affairs critic, has been and is a strong supporter of the State of Israel and of Jewish causes ("Israel and the Liberal Party," CJN letters, Jan. 31). If that were the case, however, why is it that the Liberals censured Israel more than 70 per cent of the time in United Nations votes targeting the state, whereas the current Conservative government has reduced such anti-Israel voting patterns substantially? Why is it that the Liberals attended the first UN World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in 2001, and paid for NGOs to join this anti-Israel forum (and otherwise allowed Israel to be isolated at international forums), while the Conservative Party of Canada has refused to attend Durban II in 2009, and refused to pay NGOs to attend? Why is it that the Liberals refused to join the International Task Force on Holocaust Education, Commemoration and Research while the Conservatives have? Why is it that we only hear from Liberal MPs with large Jewish constituencies, whereas with the Conservatives, their support for Israel and things Jewish are espoused by MPs with no significant Jewish constituencies and are seemingly based on principle alone? Rae, while well intentioned, seems to be electioneering, and while doing so, he is whitewashing the Liberal record.

Culturally specific schools

On Jan. 29, the Toronto District School Board did what John Tory and his Progressive Conservative Party tried to do in the last provincial election. The board has agreed to fund culturally specific schools with tax dollars. It has set a dangerous precedent that is going to be exceedingly difficult to reverse.

This presents an interesting idea for the Jewish community. What would happen if parents pulled their children from the private day schools and put them back into the public system, then petitioned the school board for culturally Jewish-focused schools? Based on the board's ill-conceived recent decision, I do not see how its members could reasonably turn down our request.

COR is kashrut authority for TO Jews

The article "Bagel Haven, Golden Chopsticks now under COR supervision," CJN, (Jan. 3) states that Bagel Haven "switched to [the Kashruth Council of Canada] COR only because they needed their business promoted." I find that this statement leaves important issues unaddressed.

Most importantly, Rabbi Reuven Tradburks approached us in an official capacity to inquire what the COR had done wrong, as we had chosen Mehadrin Kasher over COR. During a lengthy discussion with him, we explained our point about a hashgachah that includes the entire Jewish community, as well as about issues of trust and respect among the parties. This demonstrated to us that the COR had become an open-minded organization that was looking for inclusiveness in the community.

At a later date, when we approached the COR, with the assistance of Rabbi Tradburks, we found Rabbi Yacov Felder and Rabbi Sholom Adler to be amazing to deal with, reasonable, and understanding of the issues that are important to us — while maintaining the integrity of COR. I feel that the COR has now shown that it is taking the steps to be the kashruth authority for all the Jews in Toronto. I have nothing but praise for the work of these fine rabbis. Most importantly, our relationship is one of understanding and respect as we work toward a mutual goal.

Games and toys wanted

Anyone interested in helping to establish a games and toys library in Jerusalem's Gonen Junior School is welcome to bring such items to Jerusalem. The aim of the library is to assist mainly Ethiopian immigrant children, which the school has embraced. There are now 203 pupils from the ages of six to 12, and more are to follow. Volunteer Rachel Fuchs can be reached by calling 02 6240919 in order to co-ordinate drop-off if necessary.

Winograd Commission: Olmert acted in good faith

By ROY EITAN
JTA

In the year and a half since Israel's failures in the Second Lebanon War, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has weathered incessant criticism that unlike many Israeli leaders, he's no ex-general.

But this very lack of military experience paradoxically may have spared the prime minister the full brunt of a commission of inquiry's censure and saved his political career.

The long-awaited final report by the Winograd Commission published Wednesday painted a dismal picture of Israel's 34-day offensive waged against Lebanon's Hezbollah militia in the summer of 2006. It said the war was desperately lacking in strategies, relevant tactics and even proper communication between the army's top brass and Olmert's government.

"Overall, we regard the Second Lebanon war as a serious missed opportunity," the panel's chair, retired judge Eliahu Winograd, said at a news conference carried live on Israeli TV and radio. "Israel initiated a long war, which ended without its clear military victory."

A semi-military organization of a few thousand men resisted, for a few weeks, the strongest army in the Middle East, which enjoyed full air superiority and size and technology advantages."

But while the five-member panel said Israel went to war without sufficient deliberation after Hezbollah abducted two of its soldiers on July 12, 2006 in a cross-border raid, it presented a kinder view of the Olmert government's biggest and most controversial gamble: an 11th-hour ground offensive in southern Lebanon waged even as a ceasefire was being hammered out at the UN Security Council.

The report said that move, which cost the lives of 33 soldiers, did not significantly repel Hezbollah or improve truce terms. But it presented this primarily as a function of the poor fighting capability of the armed forces, voicing confidence that Olmert and his then-defence minister, Amir Peretz, approved the offensive in good faith.

"We believe that they both acted out of a strong and sincere perception of what they thought at the time was Israel's interest," Winograd said.

That perhaps more than any other statement in the 500-page report was the reprieve needed by Olmert, who brushed off calls to resign even after Peretz and his wartime military chief, Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz, stepped down in disgrace.

The report's conclusion that Olmert acted out of his perception of Israel's best interests and that the Israel Defence Forces and various levels of government share responsibility for the war's failures, bolstered Olmert's position.

His coalition partners gave no indication, at least initially, that the report's conclusions were sufficiently harsh to prompt them to quit the government and thereby hasten new elections.

Olmert's office said in a statement that he would spend the coming days studying the report and arranging for its recommendations to be implemented. Aides to the prime minister made clear he was staying on.

"Responsibility means remaining, fixing, improving and continuing to lead," Olmert's cabinet secretary, Oved Yehezkel, told Army Radio.

That was a strikingly different interpretation than the one given by war veterans and the families of slain soldiers who have campaigned for Olmert's ouster. They are saying, like Winograd, that the Second Lebanon War left Israel less capable of deterring its regional foes.

"Really, this report was harsh enough to warrant Olmert going home," said Elisheva Tsemach, whose son Oz was among the war dead.

A poll commissioned by Israel's Channel 2 TV found that 56 per cent of Israelis want Olmert to quit, compared to 27 per cent who don't — daunting figures, but nothing new to a prime minister whose approval ratings reached single digits in the war's immediate aftermath.

But with Olmert determined to see out his term in office — perhaps delivering a peace deal with the Palestinians and an effective answer to Iran's nuclear program during that time — there is no mechanism to force him out.

Olmert's centrist Kadima Party heads a coalition government with a strong parliament-tary majority capable of fending off no-confidence motions. Some in Kadima would like to challenge Olmert one day — Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz and Interior Minister Meir Sheetrit are among them — but they are also aware that Olmert is favoured by the United States as he pursues peace talks with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Olmert critics are still placing hopes that Defence Minister Ehud Barak might trigger early elections by pulling the Labor Party — the biggest junior partner in the coalition — out of the government. The Channel 2 poll found that 45 per cent of Israelis think Labor should quit the government, while 41 per cent don't.

Immediately after the report's publication, Barak made no indication that he would remove Labor from the government.

Olmert's negotiations with Abbas are a powerful reason for Labor, the architect of the Oslo peace accords, to stay. And Barak, a former prime minister who re-entered politics only last summer after a six-year hiatus, is seen by most analysts as still way off from consolidating his power base.

Barak publicly has said that for now he sees his primary duty as ensuring that the IDF is overhauled to prepare for a future war. He was quoted this week as telling Olmert's security cabinet that the prime minister alone cannot be held responsible for military failures in wartime.

"I say to you that there will be no elections," said Finance Minister Ronnie Bar-On, an Olmert confidant in Kadima. "The prime minister is firm in this position. No pressure campaign will change that."

Another Olmert stalwart went as far as to say that the opposition leader, Likud leader and former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, should join forces with Kadima.

"Now is the time for a national unity government, with which we can face the challenges that face it," said Tzahi Hanegbi, who heads the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee. "The prime minister, like all Israelis, came out of the war bruised, but there were also achievements. Now is that time to get over it and look ahead."

IDF already learned lessons of Second Lebanon War

By YUVAL AZOULAY
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Israel Defence Forces did not exactly wait trembling for the conclusive Winograd war probe report. This is mainly due to the fact that senior members of the establishment have already taken responsibility for their actions and quit the army a number of months after the war.

It should be recalled that the IDF already referred to the subject with the publication of the report into the Second Lebanon War by State Comptroller Micha Lindenstrauss. The army continues to stick to the line that it is learning the lessons of the war, and is doing all it can to correct mistakes it made.

Nevertheless, this is a long process which includes institutional and outlook changes, establishing a training program and more.

The principal goal of this program is to ensure that in every future conflict, the IDF will achieve a different result from that which it reached in the 34-day conflict with Hezbollah in 2006. At present it can be said that a substantial part of the areas requiring improvements have already been taken care of, some have already been implemented in the field, and other areas are in the course of being assimilated in work plans.

The IDF did not wait for the report and immediately after the war, under the instruction of former IDF chief of staff Dan Halutz, initiated a thorough and fundamental process of investigation and lesson-learning, including all issues and at all levels. These probes were executed by over 70 different teams, which were made up of experts, senior and junior officers, as well as reservists with a wealth of experience.

As a lesson from the Second Lebanon War, the IDF's operational perception has been updated, and today there is an emphasis on integrating the different corps in training and warfare, and strengthening ground forces' maneuvering ability. This outlook has even been tried out and assimilated within the framework of recent training operations.

A central conclusion made by the investigation process related to the area of training, and the need for the frequent training of regular and reservist ground forces. It should be stressed that also with regard to this subject the IDF has not waited for the final Winograd committee report, and has executed wide-ranging training exercises since the war.

As part of the accelerated process of increasing its readiness and fitness, the IDF has prepared a comprehensive training program for combat units, including an extensive one for the reserves. As such, there has been a 200 per cent increase in the number of regular brigade-level training exercises in the IDF Northern Command as opposed to in 2006, and a 200 per cent hike in the number of reservist brigade-level training exercises at the IDF centre for ground forces training in the south since 2006, in addition to an 80 per cent increase in all ground forces training exercises since 2006.

Furthermore, Current Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi approved last year a multi-year and multi-dimensional procurement program to implement lessons learned in the war, while at the same time preparing for future strategic threats and challenges, based on an analysis of the different zones of combat. The budget for the multi-year program stands at NIS 250 billion.

Israel's religious profile changing

The first Reform congregation in Israel, Har El, celebrated its 50th anniversary last month. In the beginning, services were held in private homes but with time the congregation acquired a building in the centre of Jerusalem, where its sanctuary and other facilities are now located.

Rabbi Dow Marmor in Toronto

In the course of the five decades, Har El has become part of an expanding movement with some two dozen sister congregations and several institutions that represent Progressive (as Reform likes to call itself here) Judaism in the State of Israel. Membership in this and the other congregations is no longer confined to Ashkenazi Jews from Europe and the Americas. Israelis born in the country, some even of Oriental stock, have joined.

Originally Reform rabbis in Israel came from overseas. Today, most are graduates of the Israel program of the Hebrew Union College. Not all work in congregations. Some do other rabbinic things. For example, one, a high-ranking officer in the Israel Defence Forces reserves, is now in charge of the year-long preparation program for young women and men before they go into the army. Another is a prominent spokesperson of the Israel Religious Action Center, the body that has earned admiration in the country for its social justice advocacy. Yet another is now the president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, the umbrella organization of Reform Judaism. Others again are engaged in academic teaching and related activities.

In addition to the narrow congregational model of the Diaspora, leaders of Progressive Judaism in Israel see the whole of society as their constituency. Yet, it would be boastful and inaccurate to report spectacular successes, despite sure signs of progress. Though many Orthodox groups and some secular ones continue to attack Reform Judaism, nowadays even the outbursts are less frequent and more muted. And most Israelis have become well aware of the presence of Reform Judaism in their midst.

The many bar and bat mitzvah celebrations in Reform congregations, and the weddings often performed by Reform rabbis in Israel, suggests that a growing number of Israelis choose Progressive Judaism. Bearing in mind that many thriving Conservative congregations also exist in Israel, and that the general interest in Judaism outside its Orthodox framework is becoming more visible, an ever-diminishing sector of the population says, in that oft-quoted phrase, "The synagogue I don't go to must be Orthodox."

Israel as a whole is the beneficiary, for the lives of many citizens have been greatly enriched and the religious profile of the country as a whole is becoming more acceptable to the majority. There is much to suggest that the next 50 years will make Israel an even more comfortable home for all Jews, irrespective of religious orientation.

Rise in anti-Semitism on campus

Staring at the swastikas drawn on my campaign posters, my first reaction was sadness and regret. It was February 2007, and I was running for student body president at Carleton University. Another one of my posters had a Hitler moustache drawn on my face.

I had two options at the time. One, take the posters down and replace them without raising a ruckus. Two, lodge an official complaint with the chief electoral officer, go to the media and make it an issue. I chose the first option.

I decided from the outset that I did not want my religion to be an issue. I did not want my positive campaign for change in student leadership to be defined by anti-Semitism. It was a missed opportunity on my part to shed light on an emerging problem on campuses across Canada: a rise in anti-Semitism.

Anti-Jewish sentiment is rising on campuses, and it is being fuelled by the anti-Israel movement, which uses political free speech as a wall to hide behind and lob racist remarks into the public arena.

The question is, why are we taking it?

Most of my colleagues at Carleton either don't think anti-Semitism is truly a problem or don't see the point of raising it as an issue.

At one Shabbat dinner I attended with three members of the Jewish fraternity in

Mark Masters in Ottawa

Ottawa, I speculated about ideas for my next column. I suggested anti-Semitism on campus, and one friend immediately stated his opposition to the idea, before recalling his own brush with anti-Semitism in first year when someone drew a swastika on his dorm room door. The sudden flashback gave him pause.

The desire on the part of many Jewish students is to move on. Our society is for the most part accepted on campus, and quite simply, we are sick of playing the role of victim. Our community is so strong in so many ways, it almost feels like sour grapes to get up in arms over a piece of childish graffiti.

Meanwhile, on campuses today, it is a fear of racism against Islamic students that dominates campaigns to end hate.

But the truth is, the number of Muslim students is vastly greater than the Jewish population, and I have found anti-Muslim sentiment to be nearly non-existent on campus. In fact, Muslim students have their own prayer room at Carleton and have been allowed to use other spaces to pray and hold events. No such permanent space exists for Jewish students.

At Carleton, I constantly hear stories about how professors teaching Middle East history courses have started to make anti-Israel and anti-Semitic dialogue part of their lectures. I tell people who experience this to go to the university Senate, the top academic body at the school, and raise their concerns. But again for the most part I get shrugs, as if there is nothing we can do and this must be accepted as the norm. It's suggested that these types of professors will simply always exist, and it isn't worth our breath to protest because then all we will be seen as is a bunch of complainers. This is a dangerous view and must be disavowed by Jewish student leaders.

We are a small community on the campuses in Ottawa, and as a result some students, especially younger ones, are hesitant to speak up about their faith. After all, when you walk through the famous tunnel system linking all buildings at Carleton and see that it is the Jewish Students' Association mural that is almost always vandalized, then what is one to think?

It's time to make anti-Semitism an issue on campus by calling on student and university leaders to take notice. Ask them to speak out and crackdown on any racist incidents. No anti-Semitic act should go unchecked.

We cannot fall into the trap of condemning incidents when they happen and then forgetting them two days later.

One day I want to come back to Carleton and walk through the halls and see a Jewish Students' Association mural untouched, a symbol that we are accepted on campus.

I don't think that is asking too much.

Israel should re-think policy in Gaza

I am paralyzed by choice. I've been writing for The CJN for several months now. They have provided me with a seemingly limitless scope of topics from which to choose; essentially, I am to write on any issue of substance and consequence that I can speak intelligently on. And yet, I find it increasingly difficult to decide from article to article what exactly I want to write about.

I usually wait to see what subject speaks loudest to me as the deadline for my article approaches. Either that, or I call my mom and dad and ask them what they think I should write about. Up until now, neither method has led me astray.

However, this month in particular I had a very tough time trying to decide a specific issue on which to write. I prefer to discuss, not the mere daily events and tribulations of a Jewish student transplanted in Halifax, but broader themes that are generally applicable (and I hope interesting) to more people.

This month, the issue that I have hesitantly chosen to write about is the Rafah border crossing. It seems, to me at least, that the more informed I become of nearly every aspect of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, indeed of all polemical partisan issues, the more skeptical I am forced to be of all involved. It is nearly impossible for all but the most single-minded people to listen to both pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian camps and unequivocally maintain entrenched in their opinions.

Jargon from both sides clouds the issue. As is often the case, the truth probably lays somewhere in between. It is the responsibility of every media savvy individual to navigate the empty rhetoric, sift through the media spin and form his or her own opinions.

And yet, what can we really know? Here I sit, in a library on Dalhousie University campus, in Halifax, more than 8,000 kilometers away from the reality on the ground in the Gaza Strip and Israel, and I try to find my own take on what is going on.

I read BBC accounts of the trade blockade and fuel shortage imposed by Israel; I read CNN reports of the potential of terrorists amassing arms in Egypt for use in Gaza; I read Jerusalem Post interviews with those injured by Qassam rockets fired from Gaza; I read Al-Jazeera narratives of the ongoing suffering in the Strip. Once again, I am paralyzed by choice.

There are few undisputed facts in this story. What I am able to conclude confidently, sitting this far removed from the events, piecing reality together from reporters I can't trust and reporters I'm scared to trust, is that there is suffering on both sides.

The people of Sderot and other Israeli towns have a right to genuinely fear the escalation of terrorist attacks — they live them every day. By the same token, the looks on the faces of thousands of Palestinians streaming through the broken border wall between Gaza and Egypt at Rafah spoke to an unmistakably genuine emotion as valid as the Sderot residents' apprehension; for the roughly one and a half million residents of Gaza, this represents their first glimpse of freedom since their border was sealed and their movement regulated.

It is doubtful that even a closure of the border will return Gaza to its previous state. That being said, the closure of Gaza one year ago did not stop the Qassams, either. Heralded as a legitimate prison break by Hamas, the events will go down in history as a crisis only if neither side can learn from them.

It is time that Israel re-thinks its policy in Gaza, moving away from starvation and assassination tactics toward creative ones. At the same time, this is an opportune moment to establish joint border crossings, operated by the Israeli, Egyptian and Palestinian governments, and administered by international organizations.

All interested parties must realize that they are not alone; in reality, all of their concerns are interwoven. Only by working together can they avert crisis and perhaps better the situation for all involved.

Lotan – an ecologically sustainable kibbutz

Concern about the state of the environment is all the rage these days. Maintaining the health of the planet is suddenly a priority after centuries of neglect.

On Kibbutz Lotan, one of two settlements in Israel affiliated with the Reform movement, environmental consciousness is part of its collective DNA, and has been for many years. "We've integrated the kibbutz into the desert environment so that we will not be a passing episode," explained Mike Nitzan, Lotan's general secretary.

Founded in 1983, seven years after its sister kibbutz, Yael, Lotan has been in the forefront of developing what Nitzan describes as "an ecologically sustainable community that maintains a balance between development and preservation."

Faithful to the biblical injunction of tilling the earth while preserving it, Lotan's philosophy is rooted in the Jewish concept of tikkun olam, or repairing the world.

A speck of green in the sands and gravel expanses of the Arava Valley, 50 kilometres north of Eilat, Lotan lies beneath the red and purple-tinged Edom mountain range and is very close to the border with Jordan.

Its economy is based on winter field crops – tomatoes, onions, peppers, melons and so on – as well as on a date plantation, a dairy herd, an organic goat cheese factory, a fish farm and a guesthouse.

The kibbutz, whose infrastructure was laid out by the Jewish National Fund, has 150 members, the majority native Israelis and the remainder from nine different countries, including Canada. Foreign volunteers, students and non-members, including an Arab-Jewish couple, also live on Lotan.

Lotan was deliberately built within pre-1967 Israel, explained Nitzan, who made aliyah from Los Angeles 25 years ago. "We didn't want to settle beyond the Green Line, and we felt that the Negev was more important than the Galilee in terms of settlement."

Nitzan and his fellow kibbutzniks subscribed to the belief, boldly and persistently enunciated by Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, that the future of Israel lay in the sparsely populated Negev, which comprises nearly two-thirds of Israel's surface area, but is where only eight percent of its Jewish inhabitants reside.

During Israel's pre-state period, Zionist planners did not regard the Negev as a priority for settlement, and much of the land acquired there was purchased by Jews in the Diaspora.

The first kibbutz in the Negev, Negba, was established in 1939. Four years would pass before the Jewish National Fund allotted land for three more outposts, Gevulot, Revivim and Beit Eshel. By 1948, when Israel declared statehood, the Negev was dotted with an archipelago of settlements. Israel has since stepped up the pace, and Lotan is one of the fruits of this concerted campaign.

In accordance with its conservationist credo, Lotan – Israel's representative in the Global Eco Village Network, an international organization linking communities committed to a sustainable lifestyle – shies away from using conventional prefabricated construction materials.

Instead, Lotan uses clay, mud, date palm branches, straw, old tires and empty bottles to construct solar-powered adobe buildings. Their smart design maximizes wind exposure and shade as cooling agents, this in a region with a blistering, though dry, summer.

Nitzan estimates that 20 per cent of the newer buildings are environmentally friendly, while older ones are being upgraded.

In an attempt to preserve scarce water resources and blend in better with its beige surroundings, Lotan's lawns will be ripped up and replaced with flagstones.

Thirteen years ago, having committed itself to a series of eco projects, the kibbutz planted a small organic garden and roughed out nature trails. These eco projects morphed into the Lotan Center for Creative Ecology, known as Eco Fun, which offers two-hour nature tours. Focusing on recycling, composting, organic gardening and alternative/natural construction, the centre's programs and educational activities appeal to youths and adults alike, and have won praise from the ministry of the environment.

Currently, with the help of the Jewish National Fund, the kibbutz is in the process of installing wetland ponds to reclaim and filter waste water. The treated water will be reused in irrigation.

The complex, located on one of the world's planners' eyes.

He and his wife – a New Yorker with whom he has three children – helped create its infrastructure and plant its date palms. "We worked all day and danced all night," he said, a hint of nostalgia in his voice.

Of the original 40 settlers, only 15 remain. "The turnover has been high. Initially, people left when their life partners didn't want to live here anymore, or because they sought job fulfillment."

Only a special person, steeped in idealism, can tolerate the challenges of hot summers and the rigours of isolation, he acknowledged.

"We're 3½ hours from Jerusalem, 4½ hours from Tel Aviv and eight hours from Kiryat Shmona."

Yet there are compensations.

"We have a vibrant, pioneering community, a slower, more people-focused way of life, close contact with nature and an excellent education system."

He added, "There are 10 kibbutzim in the vicinity, with lots of things going on. You can have a good social life here."

Terrorism, a fairly common phenomenon almost everywhere else in Israel, is virtually non-existent in the Arava. The only incident Nitzan can recall occurred in 1989, when a disgruntled Jordanian soldier on patrol along the frontier ran amok, firing on an Israeli woman and wounding her. His brother, a Palestinian like himself, was shot by Israeli troops during the first intifadah, which broke out in the winter of 1987. Since the incident, the border has been blissfully quiet.

In 1994, Israel and Jordan signed a peace treaty, Israel's second with an Arab state. Jordan has observed it scrupulously. Under the historic agreement, Israel ceded territory to Jordan that Israeli farmers had used without permission. They regarded the sandy soil in Jordan as far more suitable for desert agronomy than Lotan's gravel plains.

In the process, Lotan lost about 400 acres. But Nitzan has no regrets about this turn of events. Peace, he suggested, is more important than a piece of land.

RMIF Performance

Weighted average annualized return on unhedged equity has consistently been in the 10% range

Many people really don't know how their RRSP performed in 2007. But investors in the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund know. That's because they earned 10%, just as they did the year before.

The RMIF generates and distributes income monthly and with automatic reinvestment, an investor's annualized return is even higher than 10% because it is compounded each and every month.

Consistent high returns...that's why investors have increased their investments in the RMIF to over $400 million. Want to see your money grow consistently? Start by contacting Arthur Resnick or Wes Roitman for an information package today.

Will Gaza border become Mubarak's final frontier?

Last week, this column looked at initial media reaction to Hamas' carefully staged breach of the barrier separating Gaza from Egypt. As events continued to unfold, in-depth articles and analysis explored the broader regional implications of Hamas' gambit.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In "Over to you, Hosni," (National Post, Jan. 29), Daniel Pipes summarized Hamas' "clever surprise tactic": "After months of preparation, it pulled down large segments of the 12-kilometre long, 13-metre high border wall separating Gaza from Egypt, simultaneously winning goodwill from Gazans and dragging Cairo into the picture."

Pipes wrote: "The border breaching, ironically, offers an opportunity to clean up a mess," providing Israel with a chance to free itself from the burden of providing energy and humanitarian assistance to Gaza.

Pipes' solution: "Washington and other capitals should declare the experiment in Gazan self-rule a failure and press President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt to help, perhaps providing Gaza with additional land or even annexing it as a province. This would revert to the situation of 1948-67, except this time Cairo would not keep Gaza at arm's length, but take responsibility for it."

Pipes examined only the upside. Gaza residents, he writes, are culturally closer to Egyptians than to West Bank Palestinians, and have stronger family ties to Egypt, so "[w]hy not formalize the Egyptian connection?"

Among other benefits, Pipes maintained, such an arrangement would bring an end to the rocket fire against Israel from Gaza, and perhaps even a break in the "Arab-Israeli logjam."

However, while Pipes noted that Hamas is an offshoot of an Egyptian organization, the Muslim Brotherhood, he failed to consider the negative implications such a plan would have for Egypt.

The Islamist Muslim Brotherhood is officially barred in Egypt. While its members sit as individuals in Egypt's parliament, the party is banned, because it poses a grave threat to Mubarak's regime. The last thing Mubarak wants is to take responsibility for 1.5 million Gazans ruled by Hamas, whose parent organization is bent on overthrowing him.

For now, Mubarak must deal with closing the border at Rafah, and he is attempting to find a solution to that problem, even if that means talking to Hamas. At the same time, Mubarak is negotiating with Fatah, the faction of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, to come up with a power-sharing arrangement for the border.

In "Border crisis bolsters Islamists," (Los Angeles Times, Jan. 29), Jeffrey Fleishman took a critical look at the Muslim Brotherhood: "Demonstrations in Cairo and throughout the country by the Muslim Brotherhood and other political groups ostensibly have been staged to declare Egyptian solidarity with the residents of Gaza. But they are also aimed at weakening Mubarak, whom the groups accuse of oppression and criticize for economic shortcomings and close ties to Washington."

Mubarak's response, underreported in the West, was to crack down hard on demonstrations throughout the country — they were approximately 70 of them — even arresting scores of Brotherhood activists at the same time as he appeared to be showing patient understanding toward Hamas.

According to a Muslim Brotherhood leader quoted by Fleishman, Mubarak's government "dealt brutally with demonstrators because it is concerned about domestic stability... The regime knows that there is public outrage for other reasons, including inflation, unemployment and other accumulated problems. It fears that things will explode."

In "The Gaza Breakout" (Wall Street Journal, Jan. 29) Brett Stephens also described the problems facing Mubarak's regime as it attempts to gain control of the border and crackdown on the Brotherhood: "Having whipped itself into its usual frenzy over Israel's 'siege' of Gaza, it was a delicate matter for the state-run Egyptian press to make the government's case for deploying truncheon-wielding police to turn back the Palestinian human tide. It's an equally delicate matter for the Egyptian government to arrest Brotherhood protesters peacefully demonstrating 'for Palestine,' even if the Brotherhood's real target is Hosni Mubarak's regime and the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty that it supports."

Stephens concluded: "The border with Gaza is again being sealed, bringing the crisis to a temporary end. It won't remain quiet for long, and neither will Egypt — the next great foreign policy crisis on the American horizon."

'Pied Piper of Tzedakah' enlists help from USDS kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Danny Siegel could have spoken to United Synagogue Day School middle school students last week about his experience starting and running the Ziv Tzedakah Fund, a non-profit organization that has distributed millions of dollars to little-known programs and individuals.

He could have told them how it all started when he collected tzedakah money from friends and relatives for a 1975 trip to Israel, and how he distributed the money – a total of $955 – to people there who were making a difference.

Instead, the focus was on the students and what they could do to make the world a better place.

By the end of Siegel's 75-minute session at the school's Beth Tikvah campus (he also spoke at its Beth Tzedec campus), the man who is sometimes known as the Pied Piper of Tzedakah had enlisted a dozen students to take on specific do-able tasks, and the rest of them to help out.

Two days later, there were about three dozen teddy bears in the office of Amiel Sabari, the school's director of Jewish studies. The gently used stuffed animals, awaiting donation, attest that at least some of the kids have already taken Siegel's message to heart.

Sabari told The C/N he invited Siegel – who was in town to speak at the Conservative movement's Torah in Toronto event on Jan. 26 – to "energize" the students toward taking on mitzvot and putting into practice the Jewish values they learn in the classroom.

Siegel – a 63-year-old poet and author of 29 books who has attention deficit disorder and a mild learning disability – is somewhat teddy-bearish himself, with a white beard, low-key speaking manner and a rumpled appearance.

Dressed in brown cargo pants and a Second Wind Dreams T-shirt (from an organization that fulfils dreams for senior citizens), Siegel also sported the pink-and-purple feathered breast cancer awareness pin he said he always wears.

But his message can be harder-edged, although he delivers it in an understated manner.

"I do not believe for a minute when somebody tells you it's not how much you do, it's the thought that counts," said Siegel, who is based in Rockville, Md. "It's nice if you want to think nice and feed the world, but you have to do something about it."

Also, he added, "the second part is to find someone who's going to help you do it."

Then he called on a student to phone and "find out who in Toronto takes car seats [that meet current safety standards] and gets them to the right people," in order to prevent injury and death among children involved in car accidents.

Siegel – whose organization is winding up operations in the United States, but not in Canada – got the students onside when he asked if anyone thought it was a bad idea to collect and donate car seats.

About 30 students raised their hands when he asked who might have an infant car seat in their house that nobody is using.

He told them what challenges they might face from skeptical adults, but said their task would be simple. "Trust me... We've done it over and over again."

If they reach adults who don't want to deal with kids, he advised, "You're going to have to say to the person politely, 'Could I speak to a supervisor?'"

Otherwise, he suggested, kids might speak to the parent of a friend if the parent works at the institution they are contacting to find out who is the best person to speak to.

Referring to the saying on a T-shirt he owns, Siegel said, "You don't need to be a brain surgeon to do mitzvahs. You'll figure it out."

Just how effective is our Israel Campus Advocacy?

Part 2

Israel has ceased to exist on the poster promoting ISRAEL APARTHEID WEEK at the University of Toronto. Israel is depicted as a police state comparable to South Africa. The call for return of the refugees is code for the destruction of the Jewish homeland.

Our leadership identifies the defeat of a vote held by the Canadian Federation of Students as the #1 accomplishment of its campus advocacy, even though 1 of 3 student leaders from across Canada voted in favour of:

- declaring that Israel is an apartheid state, a criminal entity in international law.
- calling for boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel.
- banning Israeli academics from Canadian campuses.

These student leaders are Canada's future media personalities, policy makers and university professors.

Our current advocacy has failed to stem the spread of anti-Israel propaganda.

- Throughout the year campus newspapers routinely vilify Israel and the notion of Jewish state.
- This year ISRAEL APARTHEID WEEK is being staged on more Canadian campuses than ever before.
- This year for the first time, at University of Toronto's OISE, high schools are joining in the hate fest.

The atmosphere of intimidation on campuses is real.

Why has our Jewish leadership let us down?

We must speak up. We must do more.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency
Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

We need to create our own shuls

During high school, Aaron, a close friend, spent a summer in Israel and returned uplifted and rejuvenated. This isn't surprising. Israel experiences serve as important catalysts for personal and Judaic growth. What moved Aaron, however, was not the hikes or the sites; rather, it was one, run-down, old synagogue.

Upon his return, Aaron wrote a vivid description of his experience at the Yakar Synagogue, the small shul in Old Katamon. I remember reading the article and picturing myself in the synagogue. Not usually a spiritual or religious person, Aaron described a room bursting with young congregants. He wrote of melodies that drifted out the open windows, winding down the streets of Jerusalem. As a lull came to the service, the singing left way to humming and thumping that reverberated from the second minyan - held on the floor above.

What I remember most vividly of Aaron's description was not the spirituality of the service, but the simplicity of the space. Yakar is housed in an unassuming building at the corner of two quiet streets. The sanctuary had four plain white walls with cracks running along the ceiling. The few furnishings were stacking chairs and a wooden bimah.

Since Aaron visited Yakar, I have prayed there many times. The passion and vibrancy remains the same, though some of the cracks in the ceiling have been fixed. During a recent visit, I stayed with friends whose apartment backs onto the synagogue. Sure enough, on Friday evening, the calming melody of Yedid Nefesh flowed through their window gently reminding us that we were running late. As we rushed into the packed synagogue (we were far too late to get seats), I began to think about my synagogue experiences at home.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

Toronto is experiencing a dearth of dynamic prayer communities. With few exceptions, our synagogues - spanning the denominational divide - are big-box establishments catering to a demographic far older than my own. Indeed, on a typical Shabbat, while listening obediently to a cantor chant the Amidah or a president make announcements that bear little relevance to me, I am left thinking, "Where is my synagogue?"

This, of course, is not a new phenomenon. In the 1820s, the young congregants of New York's Shearith Israel petitioned the board to establish a service with fewer formalities, earlier worship times and a less hierarchical structure to worship. The proposal was quickly quashed by the trustees and so, in an act of rebellion, New York's newest synagogue, B'nai Jeshurun, was founded.

Today, nearly 200 years later, BJ is one of the hot spots of the Jewish scene in New York, attracting nearly 500 young adults each Shabbat. The BJ model is being studied by other synagogues to determine how its innovations can be replicated.

Services at BJ and Yakar could not be more different. BJ (www.bj.org), a left-leaning Conservative synagogue, features professional musicians leading services with instruments amplified through a high-tech sound system. Yakar, (www.yakar.org/eng), on the other hand, is an Orthodox synagogue that calls itself a "Center for Tradition and Creativity," and focuses on a "Judaism that is spiritual, welcoming and connected to the real world."

What unites the two, however, is a sense of community. Both synagogues seek to break down barriers, engage individuals and challenge congregants to grow within the family of the shul. If our shuls in Toronto are the big-box Wal-Marts of synagogues, these are the "mom and pop" shuls where you get both a spiritual boost and a sense of community.

From each we can learn a lesson. Yakar demonstrates that a prayer space doesn't need to be ornate. Often basements and dining rooms form the basis for growing communities, bridging the best of two primal Jewish institutions - the synagogue and the home. Similarly, BJ's history exemplifies the richness of creativity and the depth of innovation.

We can't wait for someone else to create a spiritual life for us. Rather, we must take the initiative and create our own spaces, our own shuls and our own communities.

Why Sephardim shun non-Orthodox movements

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Both the Reform and the Conservative movements have been in Israel for quite some time. In an effort to gain official state recognition, their leadership has been occupied from the start with aligning themselves with left-leaning politicians and (especially) the judiciary, before whom they have brought many cases. They have realized some moderate advances toward their goal of legitimacy. But their appeal to the Israeli masses as an alternative to traditional Judaism has not met with any real success. Countrywide, after more than two decades, they have but a few thousand followers.

In a country that by no means has a majority of people whom we in North America would call Orthodox in their practices, this is an endless source of puzzlement to these movements. Why does Israeli society refuse to embrace the Reform and Conservative philosophies?

Recently, both movements sponsored separate but similar conferences in Israel in order to examine the cause of, and possible remedies to, this rejection.

Various theories were put forth. Interestingly, the "Sephardi factor" was presented at both conferences. It's a rather complex issue, but the rejection of both movements by Sephardim is in no way exclusive to Israel, as the Reform and Conservative philosophies have been similarly rejected by Sephardi communities in the Diaspora, and they will continue to be rejected, in no small part for the reason I will explain here.

At the Reform conference, a distinction was made between two types of Israelis: traditional and secular. While outwardly looking very similar in terms of not being Orthodox in practice, the two types are fundamentally different from one another.

Secular Israelis will happily live their lives without much regard for religion. On the other hand, traditionalists have never denied the authenticity of the Torah or the role of Halachah. They just have difficulty putting their beliefs into practice in a contemporary world.

It is precisely this problem that first led to the formation of the Reform and Conservative movements. For members of these movements, religion is important, but at the same time, it's a source of much discomfort. This dichotomy between belief and practice is unbearable to them, and hence religion is rewritten or reformed in a manner that will narrow, if not close, the gap.

I propose that Sephardim are different. They can't be defined as either secular or traditional: The secularity of the world is not an antithesis to their sacred traditions. They are proud descendants of Spain's Golden Era, when the greatest Jewish scholars were as much a part of the world of the arts and sciences as they were a part of the world of Torah. Revered rabbis were also accomplished doctors, poets, philosophers, playwrights and astronomers, and their dual personas were neither contradictory nor in competition.

As for sacred tradition, Sephardim take a measured and humble approach that begins by postulating that the world we live in is not perfect, and we as humans are likely to be the last to make a claim on perfection. Hence imperfection is not just tolerated, but accepted as a normal part of life. In this Sephardi mindset, different levels of imperfection (read: observance) can sit together, because everyone realizes that in life, no one is perfect.

Indeed, life is a process of growth and of striving toward the goal of perfection. So we are all reformists, in that we wish to reform ourselves to the Torah ideal, a goal that was divinely set out for us for our own good by God Himself.

Jewish Life

Gentlemen of the Road by Michael Chabon, Random House.

Michael Chabon, the author of this wild, picaresque novel, is an accomplished master of several literary styles.

After winning a Pulitzer Prize for the Amazing Adventures of Kavalier and Clay (2000), he wrote a book for children, several screenplays and a bestselling novel about Jews in an imaginary Alaska, The Yiddish Policeman's Union (2007). Chabon is confident and limber, humorous and elegant – he commands the reader's attention.

Gentlemen of the Road first appeared as a serial in the New York Times magazine. In an afterword to the book, the author maintains that "the story of the Jews centres around – one might almost say that it starts – the hazards and accidents, the misfortunes and disasters, the feats of inspiration, the travail and despair, and the intermittent moments of glory and grace, that entail upon journeys from home and back again. For better and worse, it has been one long adventure."

The gentlemen of the book's title are two unlikely figures. The first of these is a young, pale, spare, black-clad Frankish Jewish physician, Zelikman, whose horse is named Hillel. The other, Amram, is an Ethiopian, a former soldier in the Byzantine army who fancies himself a Jew. They both bear formidable weapons.

Adventurers on the road in 950 CE

Zelikman describes himself as a person not overly encumbered by principle. "I am a gentleman of the road, an apostate from the faith of my fathers, a renegade, a brigand, a hired blade, a thief, but on this one small principle of economy... I have to hold firm: if we can only save them one man at a time, then by God we must only kill them one man at a time."

The novel is set around 950 CE, somewhere in the Caucasus, where the rootless duo experience a series of close shaves as they separate fools from their money and beat hasty retreats.

Eventually, they end up protecting a young Khazar Prince named Filaq, whose throne has been usurped by a wily and unscrupulous uncle who seeks his destruction.

The trio head for Khazaria, where a Turkic people had converted en masse to Judaism in the eighth or ninth century. Around this little known incident in Jewish history, and remote location, the author weaves a romantic account that includes unweary red-haired Jews.

At one point Zelikman and Amram become separated. The joy of finding each other is described in this way: "He rose a little unsteady to his feet. His face was streaked with ash, ash lay on his hair and scalp and his eyes were crazed with pink. He came wincing down the steps of the mosque as if his back or hips were bothering him, and he and Zelikman fell into each other's arms. From within the mosque came the broken voices of men at prayer. Amram stank of burned tallow, smoke and a hard day's labour, but underneath it all there was the familiar smell of him like sun on dusty sandstone. The sound of prayer found some kind of grateful echo in Zelikman's heart. "Late as usual," Amram said.

The novel brims with breathless action, raucous humour, colourful characters and an extraordinary elephant.

Surprisingly, neither of the main characters make much use of their weapons. They are hardly ferocious. Perhaps Chabon is making a point that Jews at heart are irenic rather than truculent – more inclined toward introspection than outward behaviour.

I must confess that although I was impressed with the author's unrelenting creativity and superb literary skills, the book itself left me confused and unsatisfied. Is this a medieval Jewish western? Is it a parody on Hollywood fantasy films? Does it carry an elusive message about the Jew as wanderer who must find the need to defend himself?

Perhaps all of these questions. Curious readers must seek the answers for themselves.

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Jewish summer camps, Pt. 1

Israeli culture and the campers themselves.

As for the Beth Tfiloh Camps, while they hold Shabbat services and are "kosher-style," executive director Ed Cohen says that parents who want their children to have a strong Jewish camping experience should send their kids elsewhere. [tinyurl.com/34pkbk]

Which brings us to a central question: how Jewish should a Jewish camp be? And how much time should be devoted to the spiritual and to the physical?

Rebecca Spence hit a nerve last summer with an article in the Forward that asked how kids are "supposed to cut loose when they're spending so much time learning to be observant Jews." New York attorney Barry Posner said, "I just want the kids to be kids... They're very deeply steeped in Jewish values, heritage and learning, so for one or two months a year, let them have a vacation."

Rabbi Mitchell Cohen disagrees. Rabbi Cohen is the director of the National Ramah Commission, which operates several overnight camps affiliated with the Conservative movement. "Families who spend a fortune on day school education and then send their kids to non-religious programs in the summer in some ways are wasting their investment... The kids are getting all the academic knowledge critical for a Jewish education and then not applying it with friends in a warm, fun atmosphere." The spirited comments following the article overwhelmingly side with Rabbi Cohen. [tinyurl.com/2y2rzk]

What is the secret of Jewish camps and their power to shape campers' identities for a lifetime? Amy Sales is co-author of How Goodly Are Thy Tents: Summer Camps as Jewish Socializing Experiences (Brandeis University Press). "Each camp has a very strong and intentional culture, camp by camp. Camp's power to socialize young Jews – how do I be a Jew?; how do I be a member of the Jewish community? – depends on this culture." [tinyurl.com/213kzp]

Maybe you're convinced camps are a good idea in principle, but how do you know if the time is right to send your own children off to camp? Ellen Nash, director of Ontario's Camp Northland – B'nai Brith says that "around age nine or ten is ideal for many kids to begin to go to camp. Twelve is sort of the top end." Ask yourself: "Do they like being with groups of kids? Are they comfortable sleeping over at other kids' houses? Those are good signs," she says. [tinyurl.com/2uyyuj]

The Family Education website also has some good articles about talking to your kids about camp, homesickness and even camp packing tips: "Send nothing to camp (except your child) that you can't afford to lose." [tinyurl.com/38a2t7]

Next time, scholarships, Jewish specialty camps and landing a job at camp.

Where to start? It's probably impossible to create a definitive list of all Jewish overnight camps, but here are some good places to look. The Association of Jewish Sponsored Camps has surveyed almost 150 camps. You can check its website for information about such matters as Jewish ritual observance, emphasis on sports and arts and staffing ratios. [tinyurl.com/39uas3]

The American Camp Association lists 132 Jewish camps [tinyurl.com/23dqkj], while Doing Jewish in Toronto lists more than two dozen overnight camps in Ontario alone. [tinyurl.com/35q5by] MyJewishLearning lists six in Quebec, two in British Columbia and one in each of Alberta, Manitoba and Nova Scotia. [tinyurl.com/ywq5xj]

There clearly are plenty of Jewish camps out there, and the differences between them can be quite significant. Steve Eller, director of Maryland's Beth Tfiloh Camps says there are seven key aspects to look out for when choosing a Jewish camp: general programming, special programming, staffing, dietary considerations, Hebrew language,

New trial ordered for Ahenakew

The province of Saskatchewan will bring onetime First Nations leader David Ahenakew to trial for a second time on charges of promoting hatred of Jews.

"Mr. Ahenakew was originally prosecuted because we believed that there was a reasonable likelihood of success and that it was in the public interest to do so," said Public Prosecutions executive director Daryl Rayner, in announcing the decision. "After careful consideration, we still believe this case meets that standard so we have decided to proceed with a new trial as ordered by the Court of Appeal."

Ahenakew was charged for wilfully promoting hatred after rationalizing the Holocaust and calling Jews "a disease" in remarks to a reporter at a First Nations convention.

He was convicted on July 8, 2005 and fined $1,000. He appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench and on June 8, 2006, the decision was overturned and a new trial was ordered. The Crown appealed to the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal and, on Jan. 14, 2008, the appeal was dismissed. That left the Crown with the option of a second trial, appealing to the Supreme Court of Canada or dropping the matter.

His conviction was overturned by the Saskatchewan appellate court because the trial judge failed to take into account the defense contention that Ahenakew acted spontaneously in response to questions and did not have the intent of promoting hate.

Justice spokesperson Candace Cook said no date for the trial has been set, but it will likely be held in Saskatoon sometime this year, the Saskatoon Star Phoenix reported.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) commended the Saskatchewan Crown Attorney's office for "its persistence in the David Ahenakew case" but said it would have preferred to see the case appealed to the Supreme Court.

"This is further proof the Crown prosecutor takes this matter very seriously, as do we," said Hershel Sahian, chair of CJC's national community relations committee.

"We are comforted by the many First Nations political and ethnic leaders who spoke out boldly and clearly against Ahenakew's tirade," Sahian said. "We will offer the Crown our continued support as the trial process begins again."

Tel Aviv University's new president seeks change

By SHELTON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

The new president of Tel Aviv University – Israel's largest institution of higher learning – has embarked on a mission of change.

"My vision is to make it the best in Israel and one of the best in the world," said Zvi Galil, a 60-year-old computer scientist and mathematician who succeeded Itamar Rabinovitch as president last June.

Galil, whose father was one of the founders of the university, is aiming at improving it significantly across the board.

A Sabra who was previously dean of Columbia University's Fu Foundation School of Engineering and Applied Science, his objective is to shake up his alma mater during his five-year term.

As he put it in a recent interview in Toronto, "I'm insisting on excellence on all levels."

Galil, who obtained his first two degrees at Tel Aviv University (TAU) before earning a PhD at Cornell University, has big plans.

He hopes to create better lines of communication between students and faculty. "Israeli universities are not known for treating students particularly well," he said. "Faculty thinks more of research than students."

"I want faculty to be more accessible to students," he added.

"I want [professors] to teach better and update curriculum more frequently. I want students to have a great experience."

Taking his cue from the United States, Galil observed that Israeli universities should treat students like "customers."

Galil appears to mean what he says. "I'm determined to bring change. This message has to come from the top."

In a bid to turn TAU into a more global institution with more students from abroad, he intends to introduce a greater variety of programs taught in English.

"We want to double or triple the number of international students. Universities aren't local any more."

And in this internationalist spirit, Galil seeks to forge extensive co-operation with overseas universities.

As well, Galil wants to see more multi-disciplinary research on campus. "Problems of society usually don't fall into one discipline," he explained.

If TAU is to be globally competitive, Galil suggested, it will need an additional infusion of $30 to $50 million (US) per annum to hire Israeli professors who currently live outside the country.

He believes this will help reverse Israel's alarming brain drain.

"We're losing some of our brightest talents to the United States and Canada," he lamented.

By way of illustration, Galil said that while there are 4,500 research professors in Israel, another 3,000 Israeli research professors live and teach in North America.

He hopes that private donors will assist him, but said he realizes that the Israeli government has an enormous role to play in this matter.

"The last few governments have cut university budgets by at least 20 per cent, something no western nations have done recently," he said.

Yet the situation is in flux, he noted.

"There is now a movement to restore these cuts. Rhetorical-ly, the government is sympathetic to increasing university research budgets. But we need results. Will they do it? I don't know."

Galil, having discussed this topic with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, believes that he appreciates the magnitude of the problem and that he intends to remedy it.

The problem is serious.

Currently, Israeli universities can tap into a yearly research budget of only $100 million. By contrast, the research budget of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) alone totals $1 billion.

Reflecting on these startling figures, he said, "We should get much more. Education is an investment in Israel's future. It is on a par with security."

Galil, who taught at TAU from 1976 to 1995, returned to Israel out of patriotism.

"I took a 65 per cent pay cut to become president. I saw it as a job of national importance."

Universities are crucial to Israel's survival, he said.

In an allusion to Arab oil and gas, he said, "We have brain power, not natural resources. Our universities are responsible for Israel's economic success, especially in high-tech startups."

Much to his regret, the state of Israeli education at the pre-university level is abysmal.

"It's bad, and has deteriorated seriously in recent decades."

Galil – whose wife is a marine biologist – was chair of TAU's computer science department from 1979 to 1982.

From 1982 onward, he was an itinerant professor, commuting between TAU and Columbia.

He ended his association with his alma mater in 1995, when he was appointed dean of Columbia's school of engineering and applied science.

"Columbia was wonderful. I like the American system very much. It's the best in the world. Salaries are determined by performance. It's a tool to achieve excellence. This system exists in a mild form in Israel."

Canada's first astronaut impresses young audience

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Marc Garneau was the first Canadian to travel to space. He is the former president of the Canadian Space Agency, a companion of the Order of Canada, and has two Canadian high schools named after him.

But when Garneau came to speak to United Synagogue Day School (USDS) students last week at the Bathurst campus, they seemed to be less interested in his accomplishments and more interested in what it feels like to be weightless, and how astronauts brush their teeth and go to the bathroom in space.

Before the question-and-answer period, Garneau, a 58-year-old Quebec City native, spoke about his experience as one of the six Canadians who was selected to be part of the first Canadian Astronaut Program in 1983.

He said that although a Canadian had never travelled to space at that point, Canadians had built a mechanical arm called the Canadarm, that was used on an American space shuttle in 1981 to both launch and capture satellites in orbit.

"Because Canada provided the Canadarm to the United States, NASA wanted to thank Canada and they said, 'We'd like to fly some Canadians to space...'" That's how the astronaut program came about. In order to select astronauts, they put a newspaper ad in the career section of the newspaper. It described the qualifications you needed to become an astronaut. About 4,000 Canadians wanted to become astronauts and they all applied. After about six months, they chose the final six," Garneau said.

"Three months after we were selected, I was chosen to become the first Canadian to go into space. It was with the crew of STS-41-G. I was chosen to fly with this crew in October 1984, less than a year after I was selected as an astronaut. This flight was aboard the Challenger."

Garneau, who has logged almost 700 hours in space throughout his career, talked about the reward of travelling to space for his first time after months of hard work and intense training.

Garneau talks about the Canadarm

"The crew comes together, and you do about a year of training before we actually fly. Finally, three days before the launch, we go from Houston, which is where we train, to Florida, which is where the Kennedy Space Center is located and from where we launch."

He said that in the last couple days before the launch, the crew relaxes and prepares.

"But the night before, you go to bed, it is a little like the night before your birthday. You're quite excited because you know that the next day is going to be a very special day. I can remember wanting to sleep but having trouble sleeping because the next day, I was going to do something that only a few hundred people have ever done."

He said that although it's only an 8½-minute ride to get to space, it's very intense.

"It's noisy, there's lots of vibration, the acceleration has sort of pinned you in your seat and it's quite a roller-coaster ride, but after 8½ minutes, when you arrive in space... suddenly it's very quiet and you feel yourself floating out of your seat. Of course, you've got your seatbelt on, and you can hardly wait to take it off and just float out of your seat: It's a magical moment because you have arrived in space. This is what you've been training for such a long time... The first thing you want to do is float over to the window and to look out and see the earth... look at our beautiful planet from above," he said.

"I will always remember all my life, the very first time I floated out of my seat and looked out of the window."

Since his first flight into space, Garneau has been part of two more missions. During his training, he met with Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut who was part of the Space Shuttle Columbia crew that died in 2003 when the shuttle re-entered the earth's atmosphere.

Garneau explained that a problem had occurred on the shuttle's launch. A tile on a critical part of the wing was damaged, and this allowed the heat to come inside the wing structure when they attempted to land. This caused an explosion and the deaths of the seven astronauts on board.

"I knew Ilan. We worked together when we were down in Houston, because that is where all the astronauts trained," Garneau said.

"I met Ilan because until you're named to a mission, you're in a pool of astronauts and there are about 100 of them from different countries. When we do training sessions, we often do them as a group. I got to know Ilan while I was there... He was a very fine gentleman."

After Garneau's presentation, students from both the Bayview and Bathurst campuses had the opportunity to ask him questions about living in a space shuttle.

"In space, we do all the things we do here on earth. We eat, we sleep, we exercise, we go to the bathroom, we wash ourselves... but it's different because we're floating and that presents us with challenges," Garneau said.

"For example, sleeping is not something you need to do on the floor — you can sleep on the ceiling, on the walls. You just get a sleeping bag and you Velcro yourself to the wall. Or if you're like me, you float. I would just float around sleeping all night long."

Students asked how astronauts brush their teeth and use a toilet if there is no running water.

He said that when they brushed their teeth, they either swallowed the toothpaste, or spit it into a facecloth. The toilets were not like ordinary toilets. They didn't use water, but they were more like vacuums that used suction to pull waste away from the body.

Another student asked what it felt like to be weightless. Garneau explained that it is a wonderful feeling, but some people experience nausea and vomiting for the first two or three days.

"But the rules are very clear. If you get sick, you have to clean up your own mess," he said on top of the students' moans and groans.

The Q and A session took a more serious tone when a parent asked what people can do to urge the Canadian government not to sell Canada's biggest space company to an American company.

"The company that built the famous Canadarm and all the robotics that we've contributed to the international space station... is called MDA... We found out a couple weeks ago that they are selling their space division to a company in the United States. I personally think it would be a mistake because this is the biggest space company in the country, and I hope the government will not approve it," Garneau said.

"We as Canadians have spent a lot of money to invest in it and built it up to what it is today... and I think it would be a pity to lose it," he said, adding that students should write letters to Jim Prentice, Canada's industry minister.

'A good place in every sense of the word'

The building, a project of Quadrangle Architects, features low-emission materials, solvent-free paints, recyclable carpets, environmentally friendly cleaning supplies, and high-efficiency heating and cooling units that can be applied in discrete areas to conserve energy in parts of the building that are not in use.

Michael Mitchell, immediate past president of Darchei Noam, spoke of the congregation's modest beginnings and shared values, including Judaism and love of Torah, social justice, love of Israel, equal treatment of men and women as well as of gays and lesbians, warmth, and being welcoming to Jews and their non-Jewish partners.

Synagogue membership has grown about 40 per cent over the past five years, said president Lisa Charendoff. As of the dedication event, there were 613 adult members – the number of mitzvot in the Torah, she noted.

MC Alan Levine, who co-chaired the capital campaign and chaired the construction committee, said that the congregation is "in a good place in every sense of the word."

Rabbi Richard Hirsh – he was hired in 1981 as Darchei Noam's first full-time rabbi by the then-40-member congregation and is currently the executive director of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association – advised congregants not to "lose track of the heart of this community... There will always be time for the details."

"This structure is a physical manifestation of our spiritual dream," said Rabbi Grimberg.

Mazon gala funds programs for the hungry

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

Staff Reporter

Mazon Canada, A Jewish Response to Hunger, is holding its 10th annual Evening of Kosher Delicacies on Feb. 20 at 7:30 p.m. at the Ontario Science Centre.

The event raises almost $100,000 annually toward feeding Canada's hungry, offering funding to various Canadian organizations including Flemington Public School, in Toronto; Loaves and Fishes Community Food Bank Foundation, in British Columbia; Maison Shalom, in Quebec; and Melville and District Food Bank, in Saskatchewan.

Shira Lester-Cohen, Mazon's executive director, said that in 2007, her organization began funding a nutritional program at three Toronto District School Board alternative schools: Oasis Alternative Secondary School; the Triangle program at Oasis for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered, questioning youth; and Contact Alternative School.

The funding, in the amount of $7,500, was made possible by a $1 million grant to Mazon from the estate of Stephen and Sophie Lever.

"For whatever reasons, many of these kids are from families without a lot of parental support, and food security is a big issue," Lester-Cohen said.

Teachers were pleased with the grant, she said, because many students live on government subsidies and have very little to eat.

"Most of our kids never think about where their food is coming from, and here are these kids fully responsible for taking care of themselves."

By holding the annual gala, Lester-Cohen said, Mazon ensures that programs such as these can keep running.

"Since our inception in 1986, we have allocated $7 million. We will never eradicate hunger, but if we can alleviate it, then we've accomplished something," she added.

At the gala, guests will have the opportunity to taste test offerings from kosher chefs, including from the Steam Whistle Brewery, Cravings To Go, DSM Foods, Eventful Specialty Event Bars, GUILT Free Cookies, Metropolitan Ice, Levy's Catering, Baldwin Kosher, Bubbies Biscotti, Feature Foods, Grodzinski's Bakery, Simcha Wine, Rhonda Litwack Fine Foods, Taam Tov Fine Catering, the Windsor Arms Hotel, Umami Sushi and Zuchter Berk Creative Catering.

For information or tickets, call Mazon at 416-783-7554.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Food blogs – a source of almost anything recipe-related

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I first met Ruth Daniels via an e-mail sent to me by my foodie friend, Renee Unger of Toronto. Renee was searching for a recipe for roast tongue and discovered Daniels' website and blog, along with the desired recipe. There was also a picture of a tattered, food-stained copy of Second Helpings Please.

Daniels wrote on her blog: "Second Helpings Please is the first book my mother bought me. It's filled with traditional Jewish recipes and I still thumb through it around Jewish holidays. I have to be careful, though, it no longer has a spine. Although many people have offered to buy me a new copy, I wouldn't part with this one. It's filled with history along with the smudges and globs of batter. This is the only recipe for challah that my family uses. Stain factor: 11." (Daniels gives each of her favourite cookbooks a stain factor on a scale of 0 – "hardly used," to 10 – "filthy and always open in the kitchen.")

That was the beginning of our e-mail friendship. Although we still haven't met face-to-face (Daniels moved to Halifax from Toronto several months ago), we keep in touch on a regular basis. Distance is not a problem – we are connected by a culinary cord that reaches across the miles!

I recently decided to start a food blog, but since I'm technically challenged, Daniels kindly offered to become my food-blog coach. She knows all about blogging – she has several food-related blogs, including <http://askruth.blogspot.com/> where she answers pesky kitchen questions and <http://recipefrom4everykitchen.blogspot.com/> which is recipes, recipes and more recipes!

I asked Daniels to share a favourite vegetarian dish for your eating enjoyment. These scrumptious recipes come from her cookbook Every Kitchen Tells Its Story: Recipes to Warm the Heart. It's available only through her blog/website in either CD version or an e-book version. A kosher version is available on request. Visit <http://onceuponafeast.blogspot.com> for more information, recipes, food photography and whatever else food-related that hits her fancy. There's more food than you can shake a fork at!

RUTH DANIELS' STUFFED ROASTED RED PEPPERS

Hands-on time: 15 minutes; baking time: 20 minutes; plus puree time: 45 minutes.

4 medium red/yellow bell peppers
2 cups shitake mushrooms
2 cups button or cremini mushrooms
1 box red and yellow grape or cherry tomatoes (2 cups)

1 shallot, thinly sliced
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 clove garlic, thinly sliced
2 cups Chickpea & Eggplant Puree (see recipe below)
1 tbsp. pine nuts, toasted garnish: finely chopped Italian parsley or thinly sliced, rolled fresh basil leaves (also known as chiffonade or ribbons)

Preheat oven to 425. Halve peppers lengthwise and discard seeds. Bake peppers cut side down in top third of oven on baking sheet for 10 minutes.

In the meantime: quarter mushrooms and halve tomatoes. In a large skillet, sauté the shallot in oil until soft, add garlic and continue to cook 20 seconds, just to get the aroma going. Add mushrooms and cook 2 minutes. Stir in tomatoes and season with salt & pepper and set aside.

Spoon 1/4 cup of Chickpea & Eggplant Puree into each pepper half and pack down, making a well for the mushroom tomato mixture. Mound mushroom, tomato mixture on top and sprinkle with pine nuts. For the extra mixture, just allow it to fall on the baking tray surrounding the peppers. Bake in upper third of oven for 15-20 minutes.

Garnish with chopped basil or parsley. Serves 4 as main dish or 8 as side/appetizer.

Ruth Daniels

Tips & variations:

- If you cut the peppers horizontally, the top half will have a hard stalk or a hole. Neither works well for stuffing.
- Grape tomatoes are smaller than cherry tomatoes and are sweeter. Daniels likes the flavour better, but both work well.
- Daniels usually makes this as part of a buffet supper or brunch, choosing smaller peppers so people can have a little of everything.
- This dish looks impressive when you use a variety of coloured peppers – red, yellow, orange and even purple, if you can find them.

CHICKPEA & EGGPLANT PUREE

Hands-on time: 40 minutes; broil time: 10 minutes.

1 small eggplant
2 tbsp. kosher salt
1 cup chickpeas, cooked, drained and rinsed (see Tips below)
1/4 cup Italian (flat leaf) parsley (packed)
1/4 cup fresh basil (packed)
1 1/2 tbsp. lime juice
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp water

Preheat oven to broil. Cut eggplant into 1/2-inch thick slices. Place them in a colander, sprinkle with salt and let them rest for 30 minutes to drain excess moisture.

Rinse the eggplant and pat dry. Broil or grill until golden (5-6 minutes per side). Cool, peel skin off and chop the eggplant.

In food processor, combine eggplant and the rest of ingredients and pulse until coarsely chopped. Makes enough to stuff 8-10 peppers halves (above).

Tips & variations:

- You can soak dried chickpeas overnight in water or use canned.
- This also makes a great spread for wraps and sandwiches.
- Just add your favourite veggies (Ruth loves marinated red peppers) or cheese (feta is great here) and you have a great lunch.
- Think picnic on a sunny summer day, or easy to pack lunch for busy days the rest of the year.
- This puree also works well as a dip with crudité or crackers.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Magyar madness in the kitchen

By ADAM MENCELES
Special to The CJN

To all of you who picture a Hungarian dinner table as a humongous spread of heavy-as-bricks food and pickled vegetables that don't resemble vegetables at all, your preconceptions are not unfounded.

While traditional non-Jewish old-country Hungarian food is full of sausages and sour cream, Hungarian-Jewish food is something entirely different. It's not that Hungarian Jews totally omit sour cream from all dishes. There happens to be a famous dish called túrós tészta that children tend to like, made by combining noodles with sour cream, cottage cheese and a sprinkle of sugar on top.

Some may call our Jewish dietary restrictions a hindrance, but I call them an opportunity for diversity and creativity. We can't rely on the heavy sour cream to enrich our meat dishes – we have to think of other ways to accent our meals.

My grandparents came to Canada with my parents during the Hungarian Revolution of 1956 and brought with them a culture rich with food and love, and a love of food. That appreciation was passed down to me through years of stories and delicious meals.

Imagine having not one, but two grandmothers cooking delicious Hungarian food for you for as long as you can remember. Classic well-known dishes such as goulash soup and chicken paprikas are just the beginning of what a Hungarian meal can be, and are only examples of the most common foods that exist in the spectrum of Hungarian cooking.

If a departure from the norm is what you're looking for, you'll find that Hungarians can be very creative. Take sour egg soup for example. No, the eggs are not left to rot and the soup hasn't gone bad. This dish is a vinegar, paprika and bay leaf broth adorned with eggs poached in that same liquid. The beauty of sour egg soup (also known as savanyú tojás leves) is that the yolk from the poached eggs flows directly into your soup, thickening and enriching the broth.

My favourite meal to date is an amalgamation of sorts. The three items in question that compose this ethereal plate of yumminess are fasirt (pronounced fasheert – a softer, lighter hamburger-type patty containing soaked challah and spices), sunny side up eggs and warm spinach purée that has been thickened with a bit of a roux and some garlic. These three items cannot be eaten separately. They have to be allowed to meld on one plate creating a harmony of creamy spinach, yolky egg and meaty fasirt.

If you would rather eat a meal that leans to the traditional, there are so many directions you can go. Chicken schnitzel and roasted potatoes are a classic, as are nokedli and pörkölt (dumplings and stew). Desserts range from the intoxicatingly sweet fánk (doughnuts or sufganiyot), to the famously delicious palacsinta (crepes), the silky smooth custardy broth of madar tej or dobos torta (dobos meaning drum – for the hard caramel on top of the cake).

When you take into consideration the setbacks Jews faced before and after wars and the lack of outside resources (especially when it came to food) that they had, it's amazing how taste and creativity bloomed in places as unassuming as farm-town kitchens and ghetto bakeries.

It may have been a need for self-sufficiency that forced our elders into a love of food, or it may be that genetically, mothers get a genuine joy from watching their children eat a nice bowl of chicken soup. Either way, there is no reason to question why or how food has become such an important part of Jewish life. Just accept it as an unconventional gift from ancestors who thought that bringing a family together would be as easy as making a heartwarming bowl of matzah ball soup.

AD'S KÖRÖZÖTT

In short, it's a Hungarian paprika and caraway cheese spread or dip. Although traditional körözött is made by combining butter, soft ewe's milk cheese, ground caraway, paprika and onion, I've come to the realization that ewe's milk cheese is not as readily available as your everyday cream cheese and butter is not a health-conscious option. The recipe below has all the taste of traditional körözött, minus the butt-widening qualities of butter and the breath-contaminating properties of onion.

2 8-oz. packages of cream cheese
1 tbsp. Hungarian paprika
1 tbsp. ground caraway seed
salt and pepper to taste

Soften cream cheese in a bowl or food processor. Add paprika, ground caraway, salt and pepper. Combine. Refrigerate for a couple of hours to let the flavours come together. Use as a spread for challah, crackers or toast, or if you're feeling healthy and adventurous, vegetables.

Note: Keep in mind that you can always substitute some of the cream cheese with butter or margarine and finely chopped onion can be added for extra flavour. You can also tweak the amounts of paprika and caraway so that the end result suits your taste.

המלחמה בסרט

אין לא מקט במקבלי ההחלטות בישראל בשאלה מה לעשות בנושא טלי הקסאם בשדרות שי קולות רמים שקראים להם להכנס לעזה ולסיים את המצב הזה. מבטא לעזה תורה מלחמה קרוב לרואי באבידות ורבת לזלזול, כאופייני למלחמה בשטח בני. הוא הצבא ילאץ להישאר שם-מזרח שוב באבידות ימיומיות שהציבור בישראל אינו מוכן עכשיו לקבל. הסיכול הממוקד שמתנהל בימים אלה מצליח אמנם לחסל אנשי טרור, אך לא להקטין את מספר הטילים והאויס החיים ובלתי מתקבלת על הדעת בשדרות, שרבים ממאשיה נטשים אותה, ולי יכל-גם הנשארם היו עוזבים. מדובר באנשי חמאס שאין להם שום עניין או כבוד מנימימלי לסבל העליים והאויס הפלשתינאים, ושקורב לרואי שמחים על הטבל הזה, שנעד להגדיל את לחץ העולם על ישראל וזוי משוואה בלתי אפשרית כמעט, והדבר היחיד שגרם לי להרגיש שהנש לא מותר הוא שביאש ההחלטות עומד עכשיו אחד ברק, ומטכיל לשעבר האיש קומנדרו שידע על ברזין את האופציות שעובר עשרים שעות במסגה למצוא פתרון מיטבי.

מסכת ליצחק רפאל הכהן דוויטש

מסתב זה ושכמותו מציגים בעיני את העצוב והצבוע שבקהילה שלנו. מר דוויטש כתב את המסתב סבילו לאור גר בסמינל או בפנת תקווה ושתולת על "כשלוך העתיד". סליחה, אדון דוויטש, אותה חי בסטורטו, וטורונטו איננה כסמינל או פנת תקווה. מה זה "קוצרים אור"- אותה בעצמך היקף ומצבתי השכלון הישראלי, אותה איבדת את היקףך לארץ בבחירות לשבת כאן, ולא העתיד שישב בארץ. אותה מקיים את סיסמת ערוץ הטלביזיה הישראלי "לשבת כאן ולהרגיש שם", ומרגיש טוב מסיפק להאשים את השמאל הישראלי במצב סע ארצה, מר דוויטש, שב בסמינל או בפנת תקווה ואי יחיה מסתבך תקו. ועד לאותו יום שחבר- חסוך מציאות את הצביעות מנגלות העיניים הזו.

ולבני המצב הנפלא שתוארת בקהילת טורונטו-לחידוך, מר דוויטש, ששיעור ההתבוללות של העתיד יהיה כאן הוא כשלושים אחוז, והפלא והפלא אין פה שמאל ישראלי להאשים אותו.

Atonement

אם ופלא הוא איננה מוכרת לכם (יד על הלב- אין לא היסטוריה) - מדובר ב"פחד". סרט בריטי זה מבוסס על רומן מר מבר שמבא את סיפורו של בן אצילים בריטיטי שנקללה עלילת שוא על בחר צעיר משפחת עובדים ששבו באחוזה משפחתו, עלילה שהודתה את חייהם של מספר אנשים. הסרט וזה כפרס הגדול של נגובוס הוזהב, והוא איזו הסרטים הטובים שראיתי העת. הוא משלים מתחשקתי ועד למשחק, לעריכה ולמוסיקה. עשר בסולם קורן.

The Bucket List

שי חולי סרטון, מנגודים באופיים, מוצאים ומצטבם האיש- מציאם את עצמם עם תוחלת חיים של פחות משנה, ובמקום לסגל ולשקוע הם מעדיפים לבצע ביחד רשימה מטורפת של דברים שרצו להגשים בחייהם. מרגון פרמיין וקל ניקולסון הם שחקנים אקזיטליים למסדרת וחסם, המצחק והצגוע ללב הזה. תשע בסולם קורן.

Hamilton organizations, McMaster U commemorate victims of the Holocaust

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The C/JN

HAMILTON — McMaster University recently hosted an event in recognition of the United Nations International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust.

It was "an opportunity for Holocaust survivors to pay tribute to those that were murdered and those that survived," said Madeleine Levy, chair and organizer of the event.

Co-sponsored by McMaster, UJA Federation of Hamilton, and the Hamilton Branch of the United Nations Association in Canada, the event was held on Jan. 27, the 63rd anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau.

It was "a tribute to those brave Soviet soldiers who on Jan. 27, 1945, liberated the survivors of Auschwitz, the Nazis' biggest concentration camp," Levy said.

The event included a photographic exhibit called A Vanished World, by Roman Vishniac. Vishniac was commissioned by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee in the mid-1930s to take pictures of the Jews living in eastern and central Europe.

The commemoration, which was attended by about 300 people, began with a performance of Children of a Vanished World, with a soprano and tenor accompanied by piano, violin, cello and clarinet, along with a simultaneous slide show of Vishniac's photographs.

There were about 20 Holocaust survivors in the audience who stood up to be honoured at one point. After a moment of silence, Cantor Marshall Loomer, of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in Toronto, sang a breathtaking memorial.

Vera Barany spoke about how she lost her entire family at Auschwitz when she was 14.

Among the many others who spoke at the event were Secretary of State Jason Kenney; Government and Consumer Services Minister Ted McMeekin; Hamilton Mayor Fred Eisenberger; consul general of the State of Israel, Amir Gissin; and Dr. Ilene Busch-Vishniac, the wife of Vishniac's grandson, Ethan. She was recently made provost and vice-president, academic, at McMaster University.

Mara Vishniac Kohn, Vishniac's daughter, also spoke at the commemoration. "We must speak up," she said. "The greatest sin, the greatest killer of all, is silence."

Vishniac, who was born in Russia in 1897, moved to Berlin with his family in 1920, to try to escape anti-Semitic persecutions. By the 1930s, he had become aware of Hitler's mission to annihilate the Jews and realized that although he couldn't save his people, he could try to keep their memory alive by taking the pictures for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which commissioned the photographs for a fundraiser.

It was a difficult task as Vishniac had to use a hidden camera to avoid being accused of spying. Also, Orthodox Jews did not like having their pictures taken. Of the 16,000 photographs that he took, only 2,000 remain.

Vishniac's photographs are on display at McMaster University's Museum of Art until Raoul Wallenberg Day, on March 1.

The Hamilton Teachers' Credit Union, the Hamilton-Wentworth District Public School Board and the Hamilton-Wentworth Catholic District School Board provided buses to transport thousands of students to the exhibit.

A series of other Holocaust-related events also took place in the city and surrounding area, including lectures at Redeemer University College and Mohawk College, and a film at the Art Gallery of Hamilton.

Human rights museum gets $1-million donation

By RHONDA SPIVAK

Special to the C/JN

WINNIPEG — HudBay Minerals Inc has contributed $1 million in honour of its 80th anniversary to the Canadian Museum For Human Rights.

A jubilant Gail Asper, the national chair of the museum who is spearheading its fundraising efforts, said, "We are overwhelmed by the generosity of HudBay... We hope this gift will help inspire other donors to join the campaign."

The seven-figure contribution from HudBay brings private sector donations up to $85 million for the $265-million project, which is now just $20 million short of its goal. Decision on a construction date will come once funding is in place, but the museum had previously been slated to open in 2010.

"I am very optimistic that we will be able to have the final $20 million committed in the next few months," said Asper, whose late father, Izzy Asper, founder of CanWest Global Communications, came up with the idea for the museum. "Then the board of the museum, which the [federal] government will appoint, will have the assurance that it has the necessary funds to build the design that has been proposed."

The museum will be Canada's first federal museum devoted to human rights and the first federal museum outside of the national capital area. It is envisioned to be the largest human rights museum in the world, with a special focus on equipping young people to become human rights leaders and advocates.

Asper has previously said that April 2008 is her fundraising deadline, otherwise plans for the museum risk being downsized due to spiralling construction costs.

The $1-million cheque from HudBay was presented to

Asper on Jan. 21 at Winnipeg's Inn at the Forks.

At the presentation, Asper said the museum has entered a "crucial point" in its campaign and that it's important to avoid complacency and to ensure every last gift comes in.

She said a meet-and-greet event that she co-hosted with Manitoba Premier Gary Doer in Toronto during Grey Cup week in November yielded some donations, which she said will be announced soon.

"We've been very busy and are thrilled with the national interest in the museum project. We've secured major gifts from other regions in the country outside of Manitoba," she said.

HudBay CEO Peter Jones (who has since been replaced by Allen Palmiere) said, "The company made the contribution in recognition of its employees, past and present, who have been vital to HudBay's success."

He said the donation was "by far" the biggest single charitable contribution that the company has ever made.

HudBay is Canada's third-largest producer of zinc and copper metal and the third-largest producer in North America of zinc oxide. It operates mines in North Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and owns a zinc oxide production facility in Ontario.

"Our company was built... with a spirit of exploration and perseverance. The museum will honour the same spirit of perseverance for human rights... We are thrilled to be part of this Canadian initiative," Jones added.

Asper said she's been receiving cheques of all sizes from Canadians of all walks of life in support of the project.

"We are getting gifts from people all across the country. More and more people are naming the museum as a charitable cause in honour of their birthday, their anniversary, their bar or bat mitzvah, or any other occasion," she said.

"On a personal level, I find it incredibly energizing and inspiring to sign all of the tax receipts for donations we receive on a weekly basis, be they for $10 or $10,000 dollars... I love getting the $10 dollar gifts just as much as the $10,000 dollar gifts," Asper added.

Other speakers at the presentation on Jan 21 included Doer, Manitoba's senior federal minister Vic Toews and former federal Liberal cabinet minister Lloyd Axworthy, who sits on HudBay's Board.

Only executive decree can free Itzhayek, Cotler says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — If the Indian government does not exercise its discretionary "executive authority" power to free imprisoned Montrealer Saul Itzhayek, he could remain incarcerated for another "one or two years" while his case works its way through the Indian judicial system's appeal process, MP Irwin Cotler said last week after meeting with India's high commissioner.

If he remains imprisoned for as long as two years, Itzhayek would continue to languish in jail for most of his remaining sentence.

"Executive remedy in the only route," he told The C.J.N. "If you have to go before the courts, it will be protracted."

The former justice minister is taking a lead role in advocating on behalf of Itzhayek, the 42-year-old businessman now serving three years in remote Motihari Prison in eastern India for entering the country from Nepal eight months ago without a valid visa. Itzhayek also resides in Cotler's Mount Royal riding.

Itzhayek and his family say he was lured into India to retrieve documents under promise of safe passage, but once there, he was taken into custody and authorities tried to extort money from him. Cotler has used the term "entrapment" to describe what happened to Itzhayek.

An interfaith delegation from Montreal joined Cotler in Ottawa on Jan. 28 to meet with India's high commissioner, Rajamani Lakshmi Narayan, and with Helena Guergis, secretary of state for foreign affairs.

Guergis, Cotler said, stressed to the delegation that "the Canadian government has pressed its case at the highest levels," a position the delegation accepted and expressed its gratitude for. Efforts have included, most prominently, representations made at a Commonwealth conference late last year in Uganda and by foreign affairs minister Maxime Bernier to his Indian counterpart during his recent overseas trip.

But in interviews upon their return to Montreal, participants also said that while they were satisfied with what seemed to be genuine efforts by the Canadian government to help Itzhayek, those efforts should not relent.

"The Canadian government has been extremely responsive," said Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem. "But we also have to ensure that the case is not forgotten. It is still an important and valuable thing to do."

Cotler agreed. "If it was my son, I would also want the Canadian government to do more."

Cotler said that Narayan emphasized to the delegation — which included rabbis Reuben Poupko, Michael Whitman, and Steinmetz, as well as Father John Walsh, and Rev. Darryl Gray — that "due process" in India should be allowed to run its course, because the government is loath to interfere with cases before the courts.

Cotler, however, said he stressed to Narayan that the Indian government also has the "unfettered discretion" to free Itzhayek unilaterally by pardoning him, deporting him, or the like.

"This is authorized under India's own constitution," Cotler said he told Narayan. "It is authorized under Indian law. It is its executive authority. There may be a generalized reluctance to use it, but [the government] has done so in the past."

Cotler noted that it is unusual for individuals to be jailed for a simple visa violation.

According to news reports and family members, Itzhayek has lost more than 60 pounds since being taken into custody. He is reportedly living in filthy jail conditions with people convicted of much more serious offenses, including rape and drug dealing.

However, in a recent report by reporter Paul Workman on CTV, Itzhayek sounded upbeat about eventually being released, and he urged Canadians to "continue to support me."

Indeed, participants hope the public will start to become concerned about his continuing imprisonment.

Rabbi Poupko said that one of the reasons for the interfaith visit to Ottawa was to sensitize other Canadians about Itzhayek's plight. Plans include publicizing the case more in Canada and even approaching the Indo-Canadian community to lobby the Indian government for Itzhayek's release.

"This type of thing should give Canadians pause," Rabbi Poupko said.

Rabbi Steinmetz said: "This is beginning to percolate to the Canadian grassroots, to the Jewish community and to the people on the street."

Cotler said Itzhayek's case is currently undergoing "appellate review."

Itzhayek's continued incarceration, Cotler suggested, could become an "irritant" to Canadian-Indian relations if the case is not resolved in a timely manner.

"The only thing I know is that he is languishing in jail," he said. "It is not the Hilton Hotel."

Two sides to every marriage breakup story

for 26 years

Question. I have been married for 25 years. I know nothing about my husband's successful construction business and have not worked for several years. We live in a big house. I have relied on him all my married life. Now our marriage is about to end. I have no idea where to turn or how I am to survive. I know he makes a decent six figure income. Our house is not entirely paid for and our kids are still in university. What happens to me?

Question. I have been married for 25 years. My wife wants out of the marriage. She has not worked all our married life. I work 12 hour days. I earn a six figure income but most of it goes to taxes, supporting my grown children in university and our expensive lifestyle, including paying the mortgage on a large house. I have no idea what lies ahead or how I'm going to pay for spousal support, for how long or what the consequences will be to my pocketbook. Will I have to quit my golf club? What happens to me?

AnsWER: You are both going to suffer a substantial change for the worse

Mr. Syrtash has now moved to a new law firm and has been appointed as Counsel to Garfin Zeidenberg LLP, Suite 800, 5255 Yonge Street (at Norton) just north of Mel Lastman Square, Civic Centre Subway station, Toronto, Ontario M5G 1E6. in your respective lifestyles. After such a lengthy marriage, the husband will likely have to split his after-tax income equally until such time as his wife remarries or cohabits for a while with another income supporting partner or until she dies, and this obligation will remain in effect until the date of his retirement. This support obligation is, however, tax deductible and continues until retirement unless his circumstances change, like illness or a loss of employment or reduction of income for some other reason beyond his control. So quitting work doesn't qualify.

The house likely be sold and the net proceeds split equally. The timing of the sale depends in part on the needs of your children and where they go to university. The value of all the assets, except the value of any premarital assets and inheritances, will be split equally, including the post-marital value of the husband's business, as will all the post-marital debts, valued as of the date of separation. The law encourages the wife to be retrained and to be reintegrated into the work force, but it is rare that Courts seriously follow up on enforcing such an obligation after such a lengthy marriage. After 25 years, the wife almost has a permanent pension from her husband if she has not worked for several years. The husband will also be obliged to support the kids until they obtain their first undergraduate degree, including tuition, books and incidentals.

Neither Garfin Zeidenberg LLP nor John Syrtash is liable for any consequences arising from anyone's reliance on this material, which is presented as general information and not as a legal opinion.

Adventurer finds his greatest challenge in the oil industry

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

He's worked with poisonous snakes, milked cows in New Zealand and done a stint as a cowboy in the Australian Outback. But for Adam Wargon, the scariest day of his life was his bar mitzvah.

Wargon, 31, said he found the idea of singing in front of a crowd terrifying.

He has since moved on to bigger challenges, currently working as a directional driller in Alberta.

Wargon got into the oil industry to repay the debt he had incurred while working with wildlife, and also for the thrill of another adventure.

"I love the oil industry because there is great opportunity here," he said. "It is an unusual industry in that it is an exception to the idea that education equals success in today's world. I work with many semi-literate people without high school diplomas who make between $100,000 and $400,000 per year.

"The oil industry is also extremely technical, and I enjoy that aspect as well... It is a physically and mentally challenging industry, but there are great rewards for those who persist."

Wargon makes $1,000 a day in the oil industry, as opposed to the $600 a month (on average) he earned while working with wildlife. However, he is quick to point out that he does not work every day, noting that the oil industry is "notoriously cyclical." People working in the oil industry are often isolated for months at a time, and Wargon says not everyone can handle the mental challenges that come with that isolation.

Wargon's passion for wildlife started at an early age. Although he was born and raised in North York, living along the "Jewish corridor" that is Bathurst Street, he spent every weekend and summer on a property south of Collingwood, Ont., along the Niagara Escarpment.

"The property was a rugged river valley with multiple waterfalls and hidden caves - a magical spot. I grew up experiencing the best of city and country life, and I am equally comfortable in big cities or remote areas," he said.

"Wildlife has always been a passion of mine. It comes from spending time in the country and exploring the natural world as a young child with my parents."

Wargon attended Sir Sanford Fleming College in Ontario to get an education in natural resources, but not without some bumps along the way.

"I used to go to the Schulich School of Business at York University. After going through the Hebrew school system I could see my traditional Jewish future as a doctor or lawyer very clearly," he said.

"Many people would consider these jobs a great success, but I had a sneaking suspicion that there was more to life, and I wanted to experience life at its fullest before I settled down."

Wargon promptly dropped out of Schulich and enrolled at Fleming. Upon graduating, he was at the top of his class and had an average of 100 per cent in two of his courses.

"My Fleming education allowed me to work in wildlife all over the world for five years and have countless adventures," he said.

Just a few of these "countless adventures" include working as a zookeeper at the late Steve Irwin's zoo in Australia, as a fisherman in the Bass Strait near northern Tasmania, and as a sheep shearer in New Zealand.

"Although I saw Steve Irwin around, I didn't work side by side with him. Terry Irwin [Steve's wife] was around, and she was very professional and committed to the zoo," Wargon said.

"To get the job, I submitted a volunteer application to Australia Zoo, and after it was reviewed I was approved to work there for a month. It was great seeing the realization of Steve's dream for the zoo and learning how to make the public's love for wildlife into a positive force for conservation."

Wargon has also worked in Costa Rica and all over the United States. His various travels have taken him to Europe, Korea and Thailand.

"I love the tropics," he said. "Life reaches its highest expression in the tropics. I love the heat, I love the lush vegetation, I love the ecological diversity. In my view, there is an energy and a passion in the air of the tropics that is not found in colder climates."

Adam Wargon shows off a freshwater drum he caught in Ontario.

Wargon takes a lot of pride in being Jewish. He received most of his education at private Hebrew day schools, speaks Hebrew fluently (it is his first language), and is the grandchild of Holocaust survivors.

"The Jewish experience is the deepest part of who I am," he said. "I have seen the tattooed numbers on my grandmother's arm and the black tissue on her legs resulting from the death marches during the war. She comes from a line of prominent and wealthy rabbis and scholars in Poland. Her husband [my grandfather] was a freedom fighter during the war who leapt off the trains to the death camps twice and survived. He was a great horseman and a member of the Polish Calvary. Some say I get my adventurous streak from him."

"On my father's side, my grandparents were deeply involved in the Workman's Circle (an aid society for Jewish families) and were responsible for settling many Jews in Toronto during the first half of the 1900s," he added.

Back in the present, Wargon says he has no plans to shift his attention away from the oil industry.

"I am completely focused on the oil industry and the unparalleled financial and business opportunities in today's marketplace. In the business world, I find my greatest challenge yet. I spent years free-climbing unmapped cliffs in tropical rainforests and catching deadly snakes alone while no one knew where I was. But the greatest adventure I have ever encountered is trying to make it in the business world. It requires all the alertness, all the discipline, and all the resourcefulness I can command.

"The greatest minds are engaged in the game of business, and I wake up smiling every day - I love every minute of it."

Wargon does research in Costa Rica as a brown vine snake looks on.

Wargon has a firm grip around the neck of a black iguana he caught while working in Costa Rica.

Israel Apartheid Week gains momentum

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The fourth annual Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) lecture series was launched at universities last week across Canada, the United States, Europe and Africa, and the event, which promotes the idea that Israel takes part in "ethnic cleansing" and the "colonization of all Arab lands," seems to be gaining momentum.

Since IAW first launched in February 2004 at the University of Toronto, organizers – including the Arab Students' Collective, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid (CAIA) – have managed to spread the event to campuses in about 20 cities, including Ottawa, Montreal, Peterborough, New York, Oxford, London, Johannesburg and Durban, as well as in the West Bank and Gaza.

A website promoting the week-long event, which runs in Toronto until Feb. 9, provided a schedule for the events taking place at York University, Ryerson University and U of T.

The schedule included a full day of radio programming on York's radio station, CHRY 105.5 FM, under the banner "Anti-Apartheid Frequencies," (sic) as well as a lecture titled "Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions Movement against Israeli apartheid: Lessons from South Africa" featuring addresses from Salim Vally of the Palestine Solidarity Committee of South Africa, Katherine Nastovski of CUPE Ontario, and Heather Kere, Ryerson Students' Union vice-president of education.

Orna Hollander, executive director of Betar Canada, said the fact that IAW is gaining momentum shows that the Jewish community can't afford to ignore it.

"The strategy has been... from an organized community end, to not lend credibility, to be quiet about it, not bring press around it... Four years later, I think we definitely learned that we can keep our heads in the sand, but it's going to go on with or without us. [IAW organizers] very much control the PR and rhetoric on campus, and it's time to stand up and take responsibility," Hollander said.

She said that the event's organizers have been able to gain credibility because of their efforts to build coalitions on campus and throughout the community.

"For example, at Ryerson, you not only have the Coalition against Israeli Apartheid and the Students against Israel Apartheid, but you have environmental networks, you have black students' associations... They've not only branched out with campus groups, but in community-based organizations that they can find support with as well," she said.

"This year, for the first time, there is a founding conference for high schools against Israeli apartheid – HAlA for short. That is something that we do need to be nervous about. Not only is there support on university campuses for this, they are sponsoring a conference exclusively for high school students."

Ben Feferman, the Hasbara Fellowships campus co-ordinator headed a program, sponsored by Betar, called Islamic State Apartheid Week.

From Feb. 5 to 7, students at York presented images and videos that depict human rights abuses such as stoning, honour killings, Muslim-only highways and executions of homosexuals in various Middle Eastern countries.

"We want to remove the connection that modern-day students have to the word apartheid and Israel and refocus it to the countries that we think really exemplify the definition of apartheid, being a policy of separation and segregation. Through a week which encompasses the themes of gender, sexual and political apartheid, we hope to get out a new message," Feferman said in advance of the event.

"As much as it is important to talk about the fact that Israel is a democracy, we really believe that we need to talk about the... atrocities that go on [in Islamic states]. People don't talk about them because they are afraid to upset Muslims... and it is because of our obsessiveness with being politically correct that these countries are suffering because of it," Feferman added.

Jewish student groups say they're also hoping to balance out the negative images of Israel on campus with positive ones.

Last week, in conjunction with the Canada Israel Experience and the Toronto Birthright Alumni Community, Zionists at U of T held an event at on the downtown campus called Israelis on Israel.

Four Israel Defence Forces soldiers who had spent time with Canadian youth in Israel as part of the birthright Israel program answered questions to teach students about Israeli culture and life.

"We feel that one of the best ways to combat those hateful claims put forth by Israeli Apartheid Week is to bring forth those people who are being accused," Hollander said.

Tilly Shames, Hillel of Greater Toronto's associate director, said that Hillel has focused on education, dialogue and peace-building on campus to make Jewish students feel good about Israel during this week.

She said that when the IAW first launched four years ago, there was more of an opportunity to try to talk with the organizers of the event about the atmosphere they were creating on campus.

"But since then, for the last three years, dialogue is not part of their vocabulary, it is not part of their approach... It is very difficult to create a space of dialogue for those who don't want to find that common ground," Shames said.

"What we found is that the organizers of this event are very marginalized on campus... and we feel that it is more effective to focus on the 90 per cent of students who are not interested in politicized events and want to come together to find a common ground for dialogue."

OneVoice calls for Israeli-Palestinian co-existence

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL. — Two visiting young people from Israel and the Palestinian territories told Canadian university students that the great majority of their generation is fed up with the status quo and the way their elected representatives are handling the conflict.

Smadar Cohen, 24, from the Tel Aviv suburb of Herzliya that was the target of terrorists during the intifadah, and Adi Labadi, 20, from Jenin on the West Bank, an area Israel identified as the source of many suicide bombers, were recently in Montreal, the last leg of a tour of Ontario and Quebec campuses sponsored by OneVoice.

OneVoice, launched in 2002, describes itself as a grassroots movement of Israelis and Palestinians who want an immediate end to violence and resumption of active peace talks. They think their leaders should not leave the table until they have agreed on a two-state solution.

Last October, OneVoice Canada was officially launched with a rally on Parliament Hill, where Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism, extended the Canadian government's support for the group's aims.

Cohen and Labadi are two of the 3,000 youth leaders OneVoice has trained in Israel and Palestinian territories, in both the West Bank and Hamas-controlled Gaza. Headquartered in New York, OneVoice has regional offices in Tel Aviv, Ramallah and Gaza City.

Cohen and Labadi believe the great majority of Israelis and Palestinians support their organization's basic goal of a Palestinian and an Israeli state based on the 1967 borders, living peaceably side-by-side.

OneVoice has collected more than 640,000 signatures on its mandate, including over 327,000 Israelis and 295,000 Palestinians of all ages, as well as close to 18,000 persons worldwide. Its goal is one million Israeli and Palestinian signatories by the end of this year.

This mandate also calls for "concrete confidence-building measures" by permitting freedom of movement for ordinary civilians and an ending to incitement. However, it offers no specific ideas on how to resolve where exactly the borders should be set and how to curb terrorism. Cohen said OneVoice is not a dialogue group, and that she and Labadi had no previous contact before they met at Toronto's Pearson Airport at the start of their Canadian tour.

In Montreal, they addressed a class of about 45 students at the Université de Montréal, as well as McGill University's Sauvè Scholars, who this year include Israeli Liran Gal, an activist with OneVoice. They were accompanied by Joel Tietolman, OneVoice Canada coordinator, and Laurel Rapp, from the New York office.

OneVoice's branches work independently, appealing to the national self-interests of Palestinians and Israelis across the political spectrum.

Mobilizing a broad-based public, they hope, will demonstrate to political leaders, and to Israelis and Palestinians themselves, that there is a viable partner on the other side with whom to negotiate, she said.

They think OneVoice differs from other peace groups in that it works on the ground, trying to make people unafraid to express moderate views. Fostering dialogue and unity among Palestinians and Israelis themselves is a more immediate goal than having them reach out to each other.

"All my life people have been talking about ending the conflict and nothing happens. I feel it is in the interest of governments to keep it going. It's easier than dealing with things like the economy and education," Labadi said.

Hillel holds a teach-in

Shames said that this year, Hillel put months of thought into the kind of programming it wanted to present.

She said that last semester, Hillel held a program during which students could play a video game called Peacemaker, which simulates the challenges of solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The goal is for the player, taking on the role as either an Israeli or Palestinian leader, to achieve peace.

"Our intention is to have it on three different campuses during the week in very public spaces so students can come together and try their hand at peace... It shows that these are really complex issues that can't be narrowed down to slogans," Shames said.

Eva Zucker, 22, a fourth-year religious studies student at York and Hillel at York's president, said she is looking forward to the programming.

"We have a wide array of Israel advocacy programming, that is bringing forth a positive message. We're doing a full-day teach-in at the Wolfond Centre [for Jewish Campus Life, at U of T], we're having a wide array of different speakers on Israel advocacy to teach people about the situation, because a lot of the time, that education is kind of lacking," Zucker said.

The teach-in — titled "Drown out the hate. Educate!" — held Sunday at the Wolfond Centre — featured professors and Jewish community leaders who led workshops including "What's left of the Zionist left?" "Media Awareness: How to use the media to your advantage," and "Jewish and Democratic: Diversity in Israel."

"We obviously don't value the negative sentiments on campus, which is why Hillel is trying to take the attention away from the negative activities and really put the focus on celebrating Israel and being proud of Israel and standing up for Israel," Zucker said.

Arbour criticizes Arab human rights charter

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Louise Arbour, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, has lined up behind several human rights and watchdog organizations that criticized the recently ratified Arab Charter on Human Rights for categorizing Zionism as a form of racism.

In a statement issued last week, Arbour noted the charter equated Zionism and racism, contrary to a UN General Assembly resolution which rejected that linkage. She also criticized the charter for sanctioning the death penalty for children and for its approach to the rights of women and non-Zionists.

"Throughout the development of the Arab Charter, my office shared concerns with the drafters about the incompatibility of some of its provisions with international norms and standards," she said.

The charter was drafted by a committee established by the Arab League and was first completed in 1994. Since then, it has been modernized to make it conform to international human rights laws. Earlier this month, the United Arab Emirates became the seventh jurisdiction to ratify the document, joining Jordan, Bahrain, Algeria, Syria, Libya and the Palestinian Authority.

Arbour's declaration came shortly after UN Watch, a Geneva-based monitoring group, criticized her for an earlier statement that applauded the Arab Charter without referring to its anti-Zionist provisions.

In a letter to Arbour, UN Watch urged her to clarify her endorsement of the charter, which "contains several provisions that promote classically anti-Semitic themes. We trust that Ms. Arbour was not aware of its contents, but this must be made clear, and the responsible person in her office must be held fully accountable," said Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch.

Neuer said the Arab Charter twice attacks Zionism as a form of racism and describes it as a threat to international peace and security that must be eliminated.

Neuer said the sections can't be dismissed as harmless rhetoric. The Syrian news agency SANA reported that Syria ratified the Charter in large part because of its anti-Zionist sections.

He called the charter's anti-Zionist provisions blatantly anti-Semitic and wondered why Arbour first applauded it after her office voiced concerns about the charter while it was being developed.

In 2004 her bureau called the anti-Zionist sections "contentious," he said.

Neuer speculated that Arbour didn't craft the first statement herself, but merely signed a document prepared by her staff. She should be given the "benefit of the doubt" to clarify her position, he said before she issued her statement last week.

Arbour's first statement on the Arab Charter was laudatory: "In this celebratory year of the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, I welcome the seventh ratification required to bring the Arab Charter on Human Rights into force.

"Regional systems of promotion and protection can further help strengthen the enjoyment of human rights and the Arab Charter on Human Rights is an important step forward in this direction."

Neuer welcomed Arbour's statement last week about the charter, saying that "she has shown courage in criticizing its 'incompatibility... with international norms and standards,' and that's a step forward."

But he added that UN Watch is waiting for "a response to our demand that the UN official who advised the High Commissioner to sign the initial Jan. 24 announcement be held fully accountable... We are talking about someone who recommended the endorsing of a charter that promotes classically anti-Semitic themes, describing Zionism, the Jewish national liberation movement, as uniquely evil, and advocating its 'elimination.'"

Al-Aqsa and Popular Front claimed 'credit'

U.S.-backed peace talks with Israel for the first time in seven years.

A Fatah source said earlier that the "Army of Palestine" wing of Al-Aqsa had carried out the attack, along with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Fatah was quoted as saying that 2008 would be a year of suicide attacks, Channel 2 Television reported.

Yellow Fatah flags flew outside the Gaza home of one of the attackers, 22-year-old Luay Laghwani, and Al Aqsa gunmen fired in the air in tribute to him. His sobbing mother, Ibtissam, held up a picture of him as a young teenager, while male relatives scolded her for crying, saying she should be proud her son was a martyr.

She said her son had gone to Egypt three times after the border was breached, and last saw him on Wednesday afternoon. He gave no indication that he was about to embark on a suicide mission, she said.

Dimona, some 40 kilometers from Be'er Sheva, is the site of Israel's nuclear reactor. The explosion took place about 10 kilometers from the reactor site, where it is widely believed that atomic weapons were developed. Israel neither admits nor denies having nuclear arms, following a policy of ambiguity designed to keep its neighbours unsure of its military capability.

Shortly after the attack, Dimona, which has until now been spared an attack, shut down all the city's schools and kindergartens.

The last suicide attack in Israel was on Jan. 29, 2007, when a bomber killed three people in a bakery in the southernmost city of Eilat.

U.S. astronauts tour Israel

JTA

TEL AVIV — The commander of the U.S. Air Force Space Command, Gen. C. Robert Kehler, and a delegation of astronauts from the United States National Aeronautics and Space Administration, completed a four-day working visit to Israel over the weekend.

The visit was part of the International Space Conference held in Herzliya to honour Colonel Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut, who perished in the 2003 Columbia space shuttle disaster.

An Israeli military spokesperson said that during the visit, the U.S. delegation discussed stepping up co-operation on space projects with the Jewish state.

Kehler held talks with Israel's armed forces chief, Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, and air force commander, Maj.-Gen. Eliezer Shkedi.

In their evaluations, Amnesty International and the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) were highly critical of many aspects of the Arab Charter, including its references to Zionism.

"Amnesty International believes that states and non-state entities should be held accountable for human rights violations under international human rights standards. For this to be done, Amnesty International believes that the reference should be international human rights standards rather than focusing on a particular ideology or ideologies."

The ICJ invited "the authors of the Arab Charter to remove the condemnation of Zionism... in order to devote the charter exclusively to protection of human rights in the Arab region, without digressions of a political nature liable to obscure the charter's basic purpose."

The ICJ identified 21 areas of concern in the Arab Charter, including the protection of minorities, women and the freedom of association.

UN Watch has been critical of Arbour in the past. In a report issued late last year, titled The United Nations and Anti-Semitism, 2004-2007 Report Card, the Geneva-based watchdog organization said Arbour had been virtually silent on anti-Semitism.

The former Canadian Supreme Court judge was also taken to task for limiting her response to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahamadinejad's Holocaust denial and threats to Israel to a private letter.

However, Neuer pointed out last week that Arbour had issued a statement coinciding with the International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the victims of the Holocaust, which was marked on Jan. 27, the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz. In it, Arbour said current expressions of anti-Semitism were a call on the world's conscience to confront intolerance and bigotry.

The Second Lebanon War:

The following are remarks made by Eliyahu Winograd last week when he officially made public the report of his commission's inquiry into the Second Lebanon War.

The task given to us was difficult and complex. It involved the examination of events in 34 days of fighting and the scrutiny of events before the war, since the Israel Defence Forces had left Lebanon in 2000. This covered extensive, charged and complex facts, unprecedented in any previous commission of inquiry.

The fact that the government of Israel opted for such an examination and that the army conducted a large number of inquiries into a variety of military events is a sign of strength, and an indication that the political and military leaders of Israel are willing to expose themselves to critical review and to painful but required mending.

We have included in the classified version of the report all the relevant facts we have found concerning the Second Lebanon War, systematically and in a chronological order. This presentation of the factual basis was an important part of our work. It is reasonable to assume that no single decision maker had access to a similar factual basis. In this task we had a unique advantage over others who have written about this war, since we had access to a lot of primary and comprehensive material, and the opportunity to clarify the facts by questioning many witnesses, commanders and soldiers, including beleaguered families.

For obvious reasons, the unclassified report does not include the many facts that cannot be revealed for reasons of protecting the state's security and foreign affairs. We tried, nonetheless, to balance between the wish to present the public with a meaningful picture of the events and the needs of security. We should note that we did not take the mere fact that some data has already been published in the media as a reason for including it in our unclassified report.

We, the members of the commission, acted according to the main objectives for which the commission was established – to respond to the bad feelings of the Israeli public of a crisis and disappointment caused by the results of the Second Lebanon War, and from the way it was managed by the political and military echelons; and the wish to draw lessons from the failings of the war and its flaws, and to repair what is required, quickly and resolutely. We regarded as most important to investigate deeply what had happened, as a key to drawing lessons for the future, and their implementation.

This conception of our role was one of the main reasons for our decision not to include in the final report personal conclusions and recommendations. We believe that the primary need for improvements applies to the structural and systemic malfunctioning revealed in the war – on all levels.

Nonetheless, it should be stressed that the fact we refrained from imposing personal responsibility does not imply that no such responsibility exists. We also wish to repeat our statement from the interim report: we will not impose different standards of responsibility to the political and the military echelons, or to persons of different ranks within them.

Let us emphasize: when we imposed responsibility on a system, an echelon or a unit, we did not imply that the responsibility was only or mainly of those who headed it at the time of the war. Often, such responsibility stemmed from a variety of factors outside the control of those at the head. In addition, a significant part of the responsibility for the failures and flaws we have found lies with those who had been in charge of preparedness and readiness in the years before the war.

Highlights of commission findings

The purpose of this press release is not to sum up the final report. Rather, it is to present its highlights. The report itself includes discussions of many important issues, which are an inseparable part of the report, its conclusions and recommendations.

In the final report, we dealt mainly with the events of the period after the initial decision to go to war, which we had discussed in the interim report. Yet the events of the period covered by the final report took place under the shadow of the constraints created by the decision to go to war, with all its failings and flaws.

We want to stress that we stand behind everything we said in the interim report and [that] the two parts of the report complement each other.

Overall, we regard the Second Lebanon War as a serious missed opportunity. Israel initiated a long war, which ended without its clear military victory. A semi-military organization of a few thousand men resisted, for a few weeks, the strongest army in the Middle East, which enjoyed full air superiority and size and technology advantages. The barrage of rockets aimed at Israel's civilian population lasted throughout the war, and the IDF did not provide an effective response to it. The fabric of life under fire was seriously disrupted, and many civilians either left their home temporarily or spent their time in shelters. After a long period of using only standoff firepower and limited ground activities, Israel initiated a large-scale ground offensive, very close to the Security Council resolution imposing a ceasefire. This offensive did not result in military gains and was not completed. These facts had far-reaching implications for us, as well as for our enemies, our neighbours, and our friends in the region and around the world.

In the period we examined in the final report – from July 18, 2006, to Aug. 14, 2006 – again troubling findings were revealed, some of which had already been mentioned in the interim report.

- We found serious failings and shortcomings in the decision-making processes and staffwork in the political and the military echelons and their interface.

temporary occupation of the south of Lebanon and "cleaning" it of Hezbollah military infrastructure.

The choice between these options was within the exclusive political discretion of the government; however, the way the original decision to go to war had been made; the fact Israel went to war before it decided which option to select, and without an exit strategy – all these constituted serious failures, which affected the whole war. Responsibility for these failures lay, as we had stressed in the interim report, on both the political and the military echelons.

After the initial decision to use military force, and to the very end of the war, this period of "equivocation" continued, with both the political and the military echelon not deciding between the two options: amplifying the military achievement by a broad military ground offensive, or abstaining from such a move and seeking to end the war quickly. This "equivocation" did hurt Israel. Despite awareness of this fact, long weeks passed without a serious discussion of these options, and without a decision – one way or the other – between them.

In addition to avoiding a decision about the trajectory of the military action, there was a very long delay in the deployment necessary for an extensive ground offensive, which was another factor limiting Israel's freedom of action and political flexibility: till the first week of August, Israel did not prepare the military capacity to start a massive ground operation.

As a result, Israel did not stop after its early military achievements, and was "dragged" into a ground operation only after the political and diplomatic timetable prevented its effective completion. The responsibility for this basic failure in conducting the war lies at the doorstep of both the political and the military echelons.

The overall image of the war was a result of a mixture of flawed conduct of the political and the military echelons and the interface between them, of flawed performance by the IDF, and especially the ground forces, and of deficient Israeli preparedness. Israel did not use its military force well and effectively, despite the fact that it was a limited war initiated by Israel itself. At the end of the day, Israel did not gain a political achievement because of military successes; rather, it relied on a political agreement, which included positive elements for Israel, which permitted it to stop a war which it had failed to win.

- We found serious failings and flaws in the quality of preparedness, decision-making and performance in the IDF high command, especially in the army.

- We found serious failings and flaws in the lack of strategic thinking and planning, in both the political and the military echelons.
- We found severe failings and flaws in the defence of the civilian population and in coping with its being attacked by rockets.
- These weaknesses resulted in part from inadequacies of preparedness and strategic and operative planning which go back long before the Second Lebanon War.

The decision made in the night of July 12 – to react (to the kidnapping) with immediate and substantive military action, and to set for it ambitious goals – limited Israel's range of options. In fact, after the initial decision had been made, Israel had only two main options, each with its coherent internal logic and its set of costs and disadvantages. The first was a short, painful, strong and unexpected blow on Hezbollah, primarily through standoff firepower. The second option was to bring about a significant change of the reality in the south of Lebanon with a large ground operation, including a

'A serious missed opportunity'

This outcome was primarily caused by the fact that, from the very beginning, the war has not been conducted on the basis of deep understanding of the theatre of operations, of the IDF's readiness and preparedness, and of basic principles of using military power to achieve a political and diplomatic goal.

The IDF failed

All in all, the IDF failed, especially because of the conduct of the high command and the ground forces, to provide an effective military response to the challenge posed to it by the war in Lebanon, and thus failed to provide the political echelon with a military achievement that could have served as the basis for political and diplomatic action. Responsibility for this outcome lies mainly with the IDF, but the misfit between the mode of action and the goals determined by the political echelon share responsibility.

We should note that, alongside the failures in the IDF performance, there were also important military achievements. Special mention should go to the great willingness of the soldiers, especially reserve soldiers, to serve and fight in the war, as well as the many instances of heroism, courage, self-sacrifice and devotion of many commanders and soldiers.

The air force should be congratulated on very impressive achievements in this war. However, there were those in the IDF high command, joined by some in the political echelon, who entertained a baseless hope that the capabilities of the air force could prove decisive in the war. In fact, the impressive achievements of the air force were necessarily limited, and were eroded by the weaknesses in the overall performance of the IDF.

The "Hannit" episode coloured to a large extent the whole performance of the navy, despite the fact that it made a critical contribution to the naval blockade, and provided the Northern Command with varied effective support of its fighting.

We should also note that the war had significant diplomatic achievements. Security Council Resolution 1701, and the fact it was adopted unanimously, were an achievement for Israel. This conclusion stands even if it turns out that only a part of the stipulations of the resolution were implemented or will be implemented, and even if it could have been foreseen that some of them would not be implemented. This conclusion also does not depend on the intentions or goals of the powers that supported the resolution.

We note, however, that we have seen no serious staff work on Israeli positions in the negotiations. This situation improved in part when the team headed by the prime minister's head of staff was established. The team worked efficiently and with dedication, professionalism and co-ordination. This could not compensate, however, for the absence of preparatory staff work and discussions in the senior political echelon.

This fact may have much significance to the way Israel conducts negotiations, and to the actual content of the arrangements reached. In such negotiations, decisions are often made that may have far-reaching implications on Israel's interests, including the setting of precedents.

The staff work done in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs concerning the adoption of a favourable resolution in the Security Council was, in the main, quick, systematic and efficient. At the same time, for a variety of reasons, it did not reflect clear awareness of the essential need to maintain an effective relationship between military achievements and diplomatic activities.

We now turn to the political and military activity concerning the ground operation at the end of the war. This is one of the central foci of public debate.

True, in hindsight, the large ground operation did not achieve its goals of limiting the rocket fire and changing the picture of the war. It is not clear what the ground operation contributed to speeding up the diplomatic achievement or improving it. It is also unclear to what extent starting the ground offensive affected the reactions of the government of Lebanon and Hezbollah to the ceasefire.

Nonetheless, it is important to stress that the evaluation of these decisions should not be made with hindsight. It cannot depend on the achievements or the costs these decisions in fact had. The evaluation must be based only on the reasons for the operation, and its risks and prospects as they were known – or as they should have been known – when it was decided upon. Moreover, it is impossible to evaluate the ground operation at the end of the war without recalling the developments that preceded it and the repeated delays in the adoption of the Security Council resolution; and as a part of the overall conduct of the war.

Findings

Against this background, we make the following findings on the main decisions:

- The cabinet decision of Aug. 9 – to approve in principle the IDF plan, but to authorize the PM and the MOD [Ministry of Defence] to decide if and when it should be activated, according to the diplomatic timetable – was almost inevitable, giving the Israeli government necessary military and political flexibility.
- The decision to start, in fact, the ground operation was within the political and professional discretion of its makers, on the basis of the facts before them. The goals of the ground operation were legitimate, and were not exhausted by the wish to hasten or improve the diplomatic achievement. There was no failure in that decision in itself, despite its limited achievements and its painful costs.

- Both the position of the prime minister – who had preferred to avoid the ground operation – and the position of the Minister of Defence – who had thought it would have served Israel's interest to go for it – had been taken on the merits and on the basis of evidence. Both enjoyed serious support among the members of the general staff of the IDF and others. Even if both statesmen took into account political and public concerns – a fact we cannot ascertain – we believe that they both acted out of a strong and sincere perception of what they thought at the time was Israel's interest.

We want to stress: the duty to make these difficult decisions was the political leaders'. The sole test of these decisions is public and political.

At the same time, we also note that:

- We have not found within either the political or the military echelons a serious consideration of the question whether it was reasonable to expect military achievements in 60 hours that could have contributed meaningfully to any of delay required change processes, and thus produce dangerous results.

- Fear of criticism in case of failure may lead to defensive reactions, working by the book, and abstention from making resolute decisions and preferring non-action. Such behaviour is undesirable and also dangerous.

- In a dynamic complex reality, one should not prepare better for the "last" war. It is also essential not to limit oneself to superficial action, designed to create an appearance that flaws had been corrected.

- It is also essential not to focus exclusively on coping with dangers, but to combine readiness for threat scenarios with an active seeking of opportunities.

- When speaking of learning, one should take into account that enemies, too, are learning their lessons.

Former chief of staff Dan Halutz, left, and former defense minister Amir Peretz, both resigned after the war.

the goals of the operation:

- We have not found that the political echelon was aware of the details of the fighting in real time, and we have not seen a discussion, in either the political or the military echelons, of the issue of stopping the military operation after the Security Council resolution was adopted;
- We have not seen an explanation of the tension between the great effort to get additional time to conclude the first stage of the planned ground operation and the decisions not to go on fighting until the ceasefire itself.

A description of failures in the conduct of war may be regarded as harming Israel. There will be those who may use our findings to hurt Israel and its army. We nonetheless point out these failures and shortcomings because we are certain that only in this way Israel may come out of this ordeal strengthened. We are pleased that processes of repair have already started. We recommend a deep and systematic continuation of such processes. It is exclusively in the hands of Israeli leaders and public to determine whether, when facing challenges in the future, we will come to them more prepared and ready, and whether we shall cope with them in a more serious and responsible way than the way the decision-makers had acted – in the political and the military echelons – in the Second Lebanon War.

Our recommendations contain suggestions for systemic and deep changes in the modalities of thinking and acting of the political and military echelons and their interface, in both routine and emergency, including war. These are deep and critical processes. Their significance should not be obscured by current affairs, local successes or initial repairs. A persistent and prolonged effort, on many levels, will be needed in order to bring about the essential improvements in the ways of thinking and acting of the political-military systems.

For these reasons we would like to caution against dangers which might upset plans and of Israeli society had preferred to suppress: Israel cannot survive in this region, and cannot live in it in peace or at least non-war, unless people in Israel itself and in its surroundings believe that Israel has the political and military leadership, military capabilities and social robustness that will allow her to deter those of its neighbours who wish to harm her, and to prevent them – if necessary through the use of military force – from achieving their goal.

These truths do not depend on one's partisan or political views. Israel must – politically and morally – seek peace with its neighbours and make necessary compromises. At the same time, seeking peace or managing the conflict must come from a position of social, political and military strength, and through the ability and willingness to fight for the state, its values and the security of its population even in the absence of peace.

These truths have profound and far-reaching implications for many dimensions of life in Israel and the ways its challenges are managed. Beyond examining the way the Lebanon War was planned and conducted; beyond the examination of flaws in decision-making and performance that had been revealed in it – important as they may be; these are the central questions that the Lebanon war has raised. These are issues that lie at the very essence of our existence here as a Jewish and democratic state. These are the questions we need to concentrate on.

We hope that our findings and conclusions in the interim and the final reports will bring about not only a redress of failings and flaws, but help Israeli society, its leaders and thinkers, to advance the long-term goals of Israel, and develop the appropriate ways to address the challenges and respond to them.

We are grateful for the trust put in us when this difficult task was given to us. If we succeed in facilitating rectification of the failings we have identified – this will be our best reward.

Authors & Poets

The C/JN is pleased to announce its

Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. They should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 14. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office.

E-mail: info@cjnnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

Submissions will not be returned. The C/JN will not enter into any correspondence with participants.

C/JN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of C/JN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The C/JN's 2008 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: C/JN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 29, 2008. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, March 7, 2008.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The C/JN of March 20, 2008. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Israeli agency tracks down unclaimed Shoah assets

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Staff Reporter

It's a unique Israeli organization, belatedly formed by the Knesset to bring a sense of justice to the heirs of Holocaust victims.

The Company for Location and Restitution of Holocaust Victims Assets Ltd., headquartered in an office building in the Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Gan, was established by an act of parliament in August 2006.

It started work just two months later.

A public, non-profit organization with a staff of 24, it's empowered to track down the unclaimed assets of Holocaust victims in Israel — land, bank accounts, artwork and Judaica — and turn them over to their rightful heirs in Israel and the Diaspora.

Failing that, the company is required to transfer the assets to needy survivors in Israel — one-third of Israel's 250,000 survivors live in poverty — and Holocaust education and memorialization forums.

"We hope to find 20 per cent of the heirs," company chairman Avraham Roet said in a recent interview.

Roet, a survivor from Amsterdam, Holland, was hidden by a succession of Dutch Christian families, and settled in Palestine in 1946.

His parents and three brothers were also saved by Christians, but his two sisters and a foster brother were murdered in Auschwitz.

Currently, the company holds assets with an estimated value of 750 million Israeli shekels, Roet said.

In addition, it has more than 100 plots of land.

Artwork and Judaica are held by the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.

The company was created by the Holocaust Victims Assets Law, whose passage was spearheaded by Labor party MK Colette Avital.

A former diplomat, Avital started the process by investigating dormant bank accounts in Israeli banks and land held by various institutions whose original owners were assumed to have been killed during the Holocaust.

Under the Holocaust Victims Assets Law, the company has been given 15 years to fulfil its mandate.

"We hope to finish fulfilling the greater part of our objectives in a meaningfully shorter period of time," said Roet.

Last month, the Jerusalem Post reported, the company began returning 1.5 million shekels to a group of 15 heirs in Israel, South Africa and the United States.

The company's budget for the first two years comes from the government. After 2008, the budget will come from management fees "charged over the company's assets," explained Roet.

Company shares are held by the Israeli government, but it has no direct control over the company.

Cognizant that a host of European countries have been grappling with the issue for decades now, Roet was critical of the Israeli government, Zionist organizations and banks in Israel for not having acted sooner.

"We believe the act of restitution could have and should have begun years ago," he said.

Asked why Israel didn't take the initiative in addressing the issue long ago, he replied, "That is a question you will have to ask the Israeli government."

But banks, such as Bank Leumi, and the Israel Museum have been forthcoming and co-operative.

"Both are making efforts to resolve the situation," he said.

Bibi seeks early elections

Israeli opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu called for early elections to replace Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

"Something serious has befallen Israel: a prime minister who failed in a war is evading responsibility," Netanyahu, a former prime minister, said. The Likud Party leader was alluding to the Winograd Commission's report on the Second Lebanon War, which censured both the military and political leaders. "The large majority of the public and most of the political spectrum want a proper and responsible leadership for the State of Israel, and this leadership can only be attained through new elections," he said. The next general elections are scheduled for 2010.

Court upholds Gaza fuel cuts

Israel's High Court of Justice upheld the fuel reductions imposed on the Gaza Strip. The court rejected petitions filed by human rights groups that argued fuel sanctions against Palestinians in Gaza, ordered by the Defence Ministry after cross-border rocket attacks, constitute illegal collective punishment. The court said current supplies of fuel to Gaza are sufficient to prevent a humanitarian crisis. It noted that Gaza's ruling Hamas, a "murderous terror group," should be held responsible for the current crisis.

Questions on cluster bombs

Israel must consider whether it wants to use cluster bombs in the future, because its current manner of using them doesn't conform to international law, the Winograd Committee said. In a special appendix about the use of cluster bombs, the committee's report said the "cluster bomb is inaccurate, it consists of bomblets that are dispersed over a large area, and some of the bomblets do not explode [on impact] and can cause damage for a long period afterward." The committee recommended that non-military elements be involved in assessing their future use in light of international law.

PayPal buys startup

PayPal acquired an Israeli software startup firm for $169 million (US). Fraud Sciences Ltd. has expertise in online risk tools. Fraud Sciences, which began marketing its product a year ago, is expected to remain in Israel and become PayPal's local research and development arm, the Israeli business newspaper Globes reported. "Integrating Fraud Sciences' risk tools with PayPal's sophisticated fraud management system should allow us to be even more effective in protecting eBay and PayPal's hundreds of millions of customers around the world," PayPal president Scott Thompson said in a release.

Film foundation director promotes Canadian shorts

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

If the story can't be told in six minutes or less, Judy Gladstone doesn't want to hear about it. The executive director of Bravo!FACT (Foundation to Assist Canadian Talent) since 1997, Gladstone provides grants to aspiring and established filmmakers to produce artistic shorts.

Through this program, which began in 1995, Gladstone has launched the careers of many filmmakers and artists, introducing them to Canadian and foreign audiences.

"As Bravo!FACT finishes its bat mitzvah year and enters its bar mitzvah year, about 1,200 projects have received over $12 million in funding across the country," Gladstone says, as she sips an espresso latte in her office in the CHUM building recently taken over by CTVglobemedia.

"It's a national program," Gladstone says, "with a variety of subject matters from animation to dance-based projects to spoken word – including short dramas.

"It's amazing how you can tell a very strong story, [provide] a big punch or a very poignant film in the short running time where filmmakers are obliged to make every second count, every frame count," she adds, referring to the fact that shorts must stay within a six-minute time frame.

"The amount of talent coming through the doors is astounding – like Larry Weinstein, who has won virtually every distinction possible for a documentary filmmaker in Canada and abroad. Or Guy Madden [award-winning director of My Winnipeg]," Gladstone says. "But we're open to people who haven't made a film, are committed to a project, write a careful script and put together a professional team even though they're lacking experience. When team members serve as mentors, amazing surprises come forth."

Gladstone recently received a Women in Film and Television –Toronto (WIFT-T) Crystal Award for outstanding achievement for her contribution to Bravo!FACT, whose short films have been honoured at festivals including the Toronto International Film Festival, Sundance and Worldwide International Short Film Festival.

She also acts as a mentor. At the WIFT-T awards luncheon, former prima ballerina

Veronica Tennant remarked on film that "Judy Gladstone really helped me make the extra leap into becoming a director. The unthinkable happened because Judy Gladstone thought about it and imagined it. She inspired me with her vision."

Tennant's film career started when she received a grant to make Cinnamon Peeler, based on the Michael Ondaatje poem of the same name.

"Veronica's first opportunity to direct was through Bravo!FACT," Gladstone says. "Now, she's working on all kinds of film projects. Once she made up her mind to be a writer and director, she worked as hard as when she became one of the world's prima ballerinas."

Another project endorsed by Gladstone was a film made by Jesse Rosensweet. "Up until he made The Stone of Folly, he worked as a camera operator. At Cannes [Film Festival] later that year, his Prix de Jury Award totally put him on the map as an accomplished filmmaker in stop-motion animation [where sculptures appear to move]," Gladstone says, adding, "Jesse just wrapped up shooting his first feature film."

Before working in the Toronto arts community, Gladstone, a Montreal native, received two graduate degrees – from the Sor-bonne in Paris, and from the University of Haifa, where she studied to become a psychiatric occupational therapist. Suffering from burnout, she began working with performing artists, and then at a cultural centre in Israel.

"I cut my teeth on the whole programming side of things before becoming a cultural and public affairs officer in Tel Aviv. Representing the best of Canadian culture to Israeli and Palestinian audiences was a true joy."

After two years of co-ordinating the Canadian International Development Agency-funded Canada Fund for Dialogue and Development, a ground-breaking cultural program that provides grants for Israelis, Palestinians, Jordanians and Egyptians to work together on various projects, she took the helm at the industry-funded Bravo!FACT.

Her initiatives have put Bravo!FACT on the map. Shorts receive national exposure on television on a half-hour program she helped develop in prime time on the Bravo arts channel on Fridays at 7:30 p.m., as well as on other channels.

"Because the talent's so extraordinary, many delivered works are gems," Gladstone says. "Since the filmmaking process is time-consuming and filmmakers return to their day jobs or are exhausted by the project, it's hard to promote the short on its own. It's easier in my position to take a compilation to a festival programmer or to a media reviewer and say, 'Look at this wonderful compilation. Perhaps you'd like to program it or do a story about it. There's a broadcast coming up.' I discovered through time it's easier for us to achieve success."

Gladstone also takes shorts into theatres across the country, triggering media coverage because the showing becomes a live event.

"Initially that idea came from Moses [Znaimer, co-founder of Citytv] and evolved over time. We'll invite the film's talent up. Audiences see this person's connection to the film. If the actors can do comedy, they'll do a five-minute routine. Folks get the added value. Filmmakers meet and start new projects. Promoters also attend. Over time, there's a sense of community Bravo!FACT helped build."

Inspired by the Banff Centre, a respected arts, cultural and educational institution, Gladstone came up with the idea of "shorts in motion," very short films for mobile phones. She parlayed that into a co-production of Bravo!FACT and the National Film Board, spawning the project Art of Seduction, 10 two-minute films, many of them award winners.

As the interview comes to an end, Gladstone talks about the influences that shaped her life. She points to the example of her mother, Mia Gladstone, who died a few weeks before her daughter received the Crystal Award.

"Born in Palestine, my mother's first languages were Yiddish and Hebrew. She was a trailblazer – the only woman graduate in a class of 499 men to pass her chartered accountancy exams in Quebec. Once married, she worked at home because she had four children. Later, she became a college accountancy teacher and mentor. She reached for new goals – teaching herself to swim at the age of 40, taking up art when she retired, then having her first solo exhibit. My mother was a woman of outstanding achievements."

Flying Bulgars ready to strut new stuff on stage

[Roula Said photo]

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

Staff Reporter

Twenty years is a long time for any group to stay together, let alone a klezmer band formed in the late 1980s.

But that's what the Flying Bulgars — known as the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band back in 1987 — have done. Sort of.

It's true, various members of the group have left for other pursuits and been replaced by new Bulgars. But over the years, the band has been nominated for three Juno awards; released five albums; has been at the forefront of expanding the klezmer genre internationally with glorious experimentation and has since dropped the words "klezmer" and "band" from its monicker.

Along the way, the band has also attracted a large following, primarily due to its willingness to strike out in new musical directions, but also because of its ever-joyous live performances and top-notch musician-ship.

Yet some constancy remains, namely the band's 20-year creative force and originator, trumpeter-composer David Buchbinder and his relatively rookie co-leader of 13 years, vocalist-composer Dave Wall.

Speaking to The CJN last week — in advance of their upcoming 20th anniversary concerts on Feb. 9 and 10 at the Al Green Theatre (750 Spadina Ave.) — Buchbinder and Wall eagerly shared their feelings on the band's longevity and its new direction.

Buchbinder, 48, said he attributed the band's resilience to "sheer cussedness, perversion [and]... love for the music. There's always been a healthy love of music."

Wall, 41, concurred and explained that this love has been redirected onto a new musical path for the band this year — an album, as yet untitled, of new compositions and all in English.

"We're taking our time on the new album because we want it to be perfect," Wall said.

Buchbinder said that the Bulgars' new path is an outgrowth of his partnership with Wall.

"We both agreed to take control [of the band] and explore our creative connection," he said.

The CJN obtained three songs from the album, and if they're any indication of things to come, the Flying Bulgars likely have another critical hit on their hands.

The themes may seem a little darker and edgier, but the music is as vibrant as it has ever been. If not more accessible.

"I've been a songwriter for many years," Wall said. "And I'm a political creature. It wasn't a wilful thing to make this CD darker."

Buchbinder added that with this new album he wanted "to create a recording that was unified in its message... and take more of a pop approach to make it beautiful."

Both Wall and Buchbinder — critically acclaimed artists, each one a composer and a musician with his own body of work — agree that the initial buzz of the klezmer revival era from the late 1980s has dissipated somewhat. And the Bulgars have felt it.

"There was an initial rush and excitement to it," Wall said. "But there's more diversity [now] in the music. Because [strict] klezmer playing is kind of a closed system. So people have always had to inject creativity to make it watchable."

At this point, Buchbinder interjects, stating, "We've never been a straight-ahead klezmer band. We're always evolving into something [new] but still rooted in a Jewish sound. The past is great to celebrate, but we want to focus on the future."

Buchbinder said audiences this weekend can look forward to sets of mostly new music from the soon-to-be-released CD "with some old-time favourites for our longtime fans," and expects to reunite on stage some of the Flying Bulgar alumni in a nod to the anniversary.

Afterward, he intends to seed the radio market with the new CD and organize an extensive tour to promote the new offering.

In fact, the band is already booked to headline the 2008 Chutzpah! Festival in Vancouver on March 2.

"I feel as excited about what we're doing today as ever," Buchbinder said.

To which Wall, pausing a moment, added, "Yeah. This does feel like a new beginning."

Along with Buchbinder and Wall, the Flying Bulgars, in their current incarnation, include Peter Lutek on clarinet, Tania Gill on piano, Victor Bateman on bass and Max Sennit on drums. For more information about the Flying Bulgars, visit www.theflyingbulgars.com

WASSERMAN DIRECTS 'HOUDINI', A NEW MUSICAL, IN MONTREAL

Montreal theatre director Bryna Wasserman, recognized for her staging of large-scale musicals, was determined to bring Harry Houdini's story to a bigger audience after the success of the Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre's The Great Houdini in 2000.

Wasserman's perseverance has paid off. Houdini, an all-new musical with book by Ben Goshor and music and lyrics by Elyan Kunin, opens Feb. 10 at the Leonor and Alvin Segal Theatre in Montreal.

The new musical features some of the legendary escape artist's most famous routines and is described as an "entertaining, musical ride" through his life "from his humble vaudeville beginnings to the heights of his fame." (Perhaps his most quotable quote was, "What does he mean, 'be careful'? I hang myself upside down in straightjackets 100 feet in the air and he's telling me to be careful!")

With Kevin Kraft in the title role, and a live six-piece band, Houdini is in performance until March 2.

Corporate Pirates of Penzance: North Toronto Players perform an adaptation of The Pirates of Penzance, one of Gilbert & Sullivan's most popular musicals, with a modern corporate twist. "As is our custom, we have adapted the original to create a more modern and currently identifiable production," said John Ricciardelli, music director of the 42-year-old community theatre group. At the City Playhouse, 1000 New Westminster Dr., Vaughan (wheelchair accessible, free parking) for six performances, beginning Feb. 15. 905-727-2209, www.northtorontoplayers.com

The Tiger Claw Reviewed: Marilyn Herbert reviews The Tiger Claw by Shauna Singh Baldwin as part of the Latner Jewish Library's Treasures in Jewish Literature series. The book tells the mysterious true story of a Sufi Muslim in war-torn Paris who falls in love with a Jewish pianist, leaves, but comes back to work as a spy, code-named Madeleine.

Two sessions are offered. The first is at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St., Tuesday, Feb. 12, refreshments 1 p.m., program 1:30 p.m. Also at the Reena Battle Centre, 927 Clark Ave. W., Thornhill, Wednesday, Feb. 13, 8 p.m. $15 at the door. Also presented by Bathurst JCC Adult Services and Schwartz/Reisman Centre. RSVP, 416-635-2883, ext. 111, or lnobel@ujafed.org. Website, www.jewishtoronto.com/treasures

A look at Jewish life and history in Italy

By VIC PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

Italy is without a doubt one of the most fascinating and beautiful countries in the world, steeped in history and filled with monuments to a great and wondrous past. On the other side of the coin, it's also the home of the Mafia, a Nazi-affiliated history and more pickpockets than any city in North America.

However, there are many more positives than negatives when one takes a close look at the entire country. Over the decades, it has become the world's second-leading wine producer and is sixth in cheese and wool output. But tourism is No. 1 money producing industry, as cities such as Florence, Venice and Rome are considered by many writers and experienced travellers as the most beautiful in the world. The art treasures are breathtaking and the history is overwhelming.

Italy is 90 per cent Catholic, yet Jewish Italy has attracted more interest from scholars than any other country in the European Diaspora. The Jewish community is one of the smallest and oldest in the world, with the history of the Italian Jews beginning in Rome in 168 BCE.

The story goes that the Maccabees went to Rome as ambassadors from Eretz Yisrael to ask for protection from the Romans against the Syrians who were harassing the Jews in Palestine. They obviously fell in love with the area even though life became rough when many more Jews were brought to Rome as slaves by Titus.

There are now fewer than 20,000 Jews in Rome, half the number living in the entire country. They are a hardy bunch of souls, having survived persecutions, slavery and concentration camps.

Jews were second class citizens when Italy entered the war on the side of Adolf Hitler in 1940. Some 9,500 Jews were arrested and deported to extermination camps.

A tour of the Jewish ghetto in Rome is a must and can be done on your own or by contacting one of the local guides who can be found through the Internet. The cost is about eight euros or $12 per adult.

A visit to the main synagogue is a must. It is located in the heart of the ghetto and also houses the Jewish museum where books and Judaica are sold. Security is everywhere evident and has been in place at various Jewish buildings since several terrorism attacks in Rome in 1985.

There are also happy memories. Local residents fondly recall the visit by Pope Paul II to the temple in 1986. It was the first time in history that a pope had entered a synagogue, and his words to "my elder brothers" are remembered with pride. All synagogues in Italy are Orthodox.

Nearby is the Palace of Culture, Jewish schools, stores, a bookshop, fast foods and kosher restaurants. The old ghetto is the meeting place for Jews from Rome and around the world.

We sat outside with Jews visiting from Sweden, England and the United States and enjoyed the fish soup and carciofi alla Giudia (Jewish-style artichokes). Sitting in the sun, surrounded by history and enjoying ancient and traditional cuisine in one of the most beautiful cities in the world is a memory to be long cherished.

For a different diversion, try spotting pickpockets, but from a safe distance. It's easy in large centres such as Rome, especially at tourist sites like the Trevi Fountain, which is always lively and attracts thousands of tourists standing shoulder to shoulder every day, winter or summer.

People who like to throw money away toss coins into the fountain believing it will give them a wish and assure their return to Italy. It's the perfect location to watch nimble fingers pulling out wallets from back pockets and purses from the unsuspecting. I saw three thieves work their scam in a 10-minute period. The best advice: wear a money belt.

Almost half the Italian Jewish population of approximately 40,000 are located in Milan, Turin, Trieste, Florence and Venice. A few hundred can be found in Bologna and Naples. Driving in Italy definitely takes courage so we travelled about the country in a luxurious bus that allowed us to enjoy the country's beauty at a leisurely pace.

It was a relaxing trip with plenty of time to enjoy some lengthy lunches and dinners while partaking of the best Chianti wines in the world in the Tuscany region.

Florence is the home of the Renaissance, but if history is not your main interest and food is, then you can fill up some of the best in the world. Florence is small, but it is noisy with attractive women in high heels and young men covered with expensive leather zooming about kamikaze-style on their scooters.

Jewish visitors should definitely visit the Piazza Santa Croce and see the church with the 19th-century facade showing the Star of David. It's a short walk to the Academy of Fine Arts housing the most famous statue in the world, David by Michelangelo. A visit to the Museum of Jewish History and Art in Florence is also possible if one is spending a full day in the city.

Not to be missed is Florence's archival Siena, which is a half-hour bus ride away and also has a synagogue. The city is considered by many Italians as "numero uno" for its beauty, with its historic centre that can be enjoyed quietly, as Siena is an almost vehicle-free city where pedestrians rule.

Jewish life and history are expressed most fully in this wonderful country and are considered by modern scholars to be an integral part of the Italian mosaic and heritage.

Insight Tours brochures are available from most travel agents. Vic Phillips is a writer and broadcaster and a member of the Travel Media Association of Canada.

Book chronicles Montreal theatre

By HEATHER SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

When Muriel Gold decided to record the history of Montreal's Saidye Bronfman Centre Theatre, she launched an intensive three-year book project. She aimed to complete it for the centre's 40th anniversary last year.

The centre will never celebrate its 40th, however, as it has divorced itself both from the YW-YMHA and the Bronfmans to morph into the Segal Centre for the Performing Arts at The Saidye.

As a result, Gold's book becomes more important than ever. It doesn't just record a period in the life of an institution. It is witness to an era.

The book, A Gift for Their Mother: The Saidye Bronfman Centre Theatre, A History, (MIRI Productions) was published late last fall.

Gold conducted more than 60 interviews for the book and pored for hours through hard-to-access archives and her own rich memory bank. The book tells the story of the theatre from its inception.

The main stage opened in 1967 as part of the building honouring the 70th birthday of Saidye Bronfman, mother and grandmother of the Bronfman family. It had been conceived as more of an all-purpose space that resembled a lecture hall, with no separate backstage area and uncomfortable vinyl banquettes that had audiences squirming their way through the first decade of productions.

Folding, upholstered theatre seats were a welcome relief during the 1986 renovations. A second stage that presented parallel productions was opened in the Y auditorium for a brief, four-year period.

Beyond the physical challenges, however, there was controversy, squabbling and the ups and downs of the reigns of successive artistic directors, described in fascinating detail in the 350-page book.

Gold was on-site for the first 13 years, as a member of the founding performing arts committee that worked with artistic director Marion André, and, from 1972 to 1980, she took over as artistic director.

Gold had been recommended for the job by Dora Wasserman, whom she had interviewed for her McGill master's thesis on Three Montreal Children's Theatres in British, French and Russian Traditions. Gold had been a teacher for the Montreal Children's Theatre run by the venerable duo of Dorothy Davis Stein and Violet Walters.

During her directorship of the Saidye Bronfman Centre

Theatre, Gold initiated the policy of producing Québécois plays in translation, original anglophone Canadian works, along with international repertoire. She was the first director to persuade Michel Tremblay to break his vow never to have his plays presented in English in Quebec.

Gold was recently named a member of the Order of Canada, in part for her tireless work in bridging the two solitudes (French and English), much of it having taken place during her tenure at the theatre.

The André years established the theatre as a polished, professional stage. However, all its artistic directors had to deal with the dichotomy of its being a mainstream Canadian theatre while, at the same time, being part of a Jewish cultural centre.

A prime example of this two-headedness was The Man in the Glass Booth debacle during André's tenure, detailed in Gold's book. While still in rehearsal, it both alienated Holocaust survivors and turned the press and grant-giving bodies against the theatre for what they felt was censorship when the show was cancelled.

Gold recalls ruefully how she inherited the theatre after its subscription base had been decimated to 300.

"Some people congratulated me on my appointment. Some gave me condolences. They didn't envy me at all," she says.

Yet Gold succeeded in bringing 6,000 audience members back into the fold.

Gold finds it ironic that André never warmed to the presence of the amateur Yiddish Theatre due to the vagaries of its rehearsal scheduling to accommodate cast members' day jobs, and due to its demands on the professional theatre staff.

The irony is that the Yiddish Theatre survived the English stage's wavering fortunes between the last strong season under Per Brask and the mostly outside productions brought in by Nathalie Bonjour. Also, the Yiddish Theatre, whose staunchest supporters are Leonor and Alvin Segal, served as the catalyst for the establishment of the new Segal Centre.

The brilliant Bryna Wasserman initially arrived on the scene to help her ailing mother Dora and, finally, took up her torch, going on to prove that she could combine the English and Yiddish theatres into a powerhouse of entertainment.

That we now have Muriel Gold's historical and anecdotal account of how it all came about makes the hard-won present even more of a gift.

Toronto Yiddishist keeps on kvetching

By BILL GLADSTONE

Special to The C/JN

With two new books in print to follow his bestseller Born to Kvetch, and enjoying a new popularity with Jewish audiences who delight in his erudite knowledge of Yiddish, Toronto writer Michael Wex can no longer be said to be languishing in obscurity.

In the round fullness of middle age, the Lethbridge-born Yiddishist put himself on the map – and on the New York Times bestsellers list for about 10 weeks – with the publication in 2005 of Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All of Its Moods.

The book soon became a bona fide publishing sensation, a fact that seems doubly astonishing when one considers the witty tome focuses on the intricacies and psychology of a language commonly presumed to be deceased.

But Yiddish, Wex proclaimed in a recent interview, “is like Paul McCartney and Mark Twain. It might not be quite as dead as people thought it was.”

He had been writing the book for more than a decade without realizing it – collecting tidbits of information about Yiddish the way some people compulsively gather bits of string, not knowing how they may eventually be used. The previous author of Shlepping the Exile, a book that may have sold in the low hundreds, Wex was propelled into the media spotlight as Born to Kvetch sold about 90,000 copies in hardcover, then another 100,000 or so in paperback.

He appeared on NBC's Today Show just before the Christmas and Chanukah shopping season, and the publicity generated sales of 16,000 books in one week.

“I made more in that week than I made in a year teaching at Ryerson on contract,” he said.

The book's popularity apparently took its publisher, St. Martin's Press, by surprise. Bookstores ran out of the title and eager would-be readers flocked to order it online at Amazon.

Michael Wex

For a while, Born to Kvetch was the Internet bookseller's second-most requested title. – “What does that mean? You never do find out,” the happy scribe observed. “But it does wonders for your self-esteem, and it doesn't hurt your bank balance, either.”

Last year, Born to Kvetch earned a Canadian Jewish Book Award as well as an honourable mention from the American Library Association.

Wex recently followed up that remarkable publishing triumph with what he hopes will be another: Just Say Nu, Yiddish for Every Occasion (When English Just Won't Do), also published by St. Martin's Press.

And Quattro Books of Thornhill has recently published his novella The Adventures of Micah Mushmelon, Boy Talmudist, in which the protagonist is a brilliant chassidic yeshiva bocher modelled after Sherlock Holmes.

Like the literary detective upon which his character is based, Micah Mushmelon has many rare qualities. For one thing, he graduated from high school at the age of just nine months.

“There's a Jewish folk legend that every Jewish soul who is about to be born spends his pre-birth time learning Torah from Moshe in heaven,” Wex explained. “Then, just before you're born, an angel taps you on the mouth and you forget everything. Micah was supposed to have avoided getting hit, so he's born with all of this knowledge.”

As for Wex, he was born into an observant, Yiddish-speaking home, never dreaming while he was growing up in Lethbridge and later Calgary that he would put the mamaloshen to such good use. He attended high school in Toronto and studied English and medieval studies at the University of Toronto. He's worked as a writer, translator, medical researcher and Yiddish instructor.

While Born to Kvetch isn't shy about raising touchy Jewish-Christian interfaith issues and pulls no punches when making barbed satirical references to gentile persecution of the Jews in centuries past, Wex, an innate satirist, makes no apologies for that.

“I've had people say, ‘That was very cute, but you shouldn't say that in front of them,’” he said. “But you'd think that after the Crusades and the Holocaust, they could take a little ribbing now and then.”

“These attitudes are so deeply ingrained in the development of the language, you can't not talk about them,” he continued. “It's like if you were to write a book about the development of black English, you couldn't ignore slavery and segregation and Jim Crow laws.”

Wex, who lives in midtown Toronto with his wife and daughter, is currently finishing a young adult novel about the exodus from Egypt for an American publishing house. When writing such a tale, “the Bible determines your plot lines,” he said, but that still leaves plenty of room for creativity because “the Bible goes from A to C, but you've got to get through B,” he observed.

Hoping to make himself even more of a household name, he's also planning a non-fiction volume called Wexology, to include an assortment of essays, stories and other pieces. Meanwhile, he's still receiving plenty of speaking invitations, which will necessitate numerous trips throughout Canada and the United States this year.

“They still want you for a dollar and a quarter,” he observed wryly. “Before, it was, ‘We don't have to pay you, you're a nobody.’ Now, it's ‘You're so famous, what do you need the money for?’”

Plans underway for 2009 Israel hockey tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Preparations are already underway to reclaim for Canada another international hockey title as well as bragging rights in the Jewish sports world.

Canadian organizers of the World Jewish Hockey Championship are scouting potential talent and putting out the word they are looking for skaters interested in travelling to Israel in July 2009 to compete for the title. Last summer, the Jew-lagged Canadians dropped an early decision to the host Israelis and never recovered, finishing third in the four-team tournament.

The powerhouse U.S. team, bolstered by NHL prospect Nathan Davis (now with the Philadelphia Phantoms of the AHL), won the title, defeating Israel in the championship game. Canada finished ahead of only France.

The same quartet of countries is likely to reprise the 2007 tournament, said Alex Voihanski, general manager of the Canadian team. In addition, organizers are planning a junior tournament of under-17 players to run parallel to the senior competition. Canada is planning to ice two junior teams as are the Americans. Israel and a European team will round out the competition.

All games will be played at the Canada Center in Metulla, on Israel's northern border with Lebanon.

The tournament, which runs from July 5-17, will overlap with the Maccabiah Games, which get under way in central Israel later the same month.

In preparation for the hockey event, a training and orientation camp is planned for this summer, likely in June, Voihanski stated. Not only will it permit coaches to evaluate the players, but it will give organizers the opportunity to discuss the off-ice benefits of visiting Israel.

For many participants last year, the visit to Israel was a real eye-opener and it afforded the opportunity to reconnect with their Jewish roots. Many were in Israel for the first time and were moved by the visit to the Western Wall as well as Tiberias and other noteworthy sites, he said.

What's more, the hockey was very high calibre. Players gave good efforts on the ice and then met their opponents in the local bar in an admirable display of camaraderie, he said.

Games were almost all sold out, with as many as 1,500 spectators taking in the action, including Israeli soldiers stationed on the border near by. The atmosphere was festive with fans employing soccer chants during the action.

"It was a massive success, beyond our wildest dreams," Voihanski said.

The only thing missing for Canada was a victory. Voihanski maintains that had all the eligible players suited up for Canada, the true north could have walked away with the title. But players like Michael and Adam Henrich, Eric Himelfarb, Corey Pecker and David Nemirovsky were unavailable, many because they were free agents looking for a contract.

With those players and the likes of Jacob Mieflikier, and East Coast all-star Trevor Smith, a forward with Bridgeport Sound Tigers in the American Hockey League, Canada will be tough to beat in 2009, Voihanski said.

Israel loses to Russia in Fed Cup Singles tennis quarterfinals

By RUTH MARGALIT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT HASHARON, Israel — Israeli tennis star Shahar Peer lost Sunday to newly crowned Australian Open Champion Maria Sharapova on the second day of the Fed Cup World Group quarterfinal.

The game ended in just two sets, with the Russian easily defeating Peer 6:1, 6:1, after repeatedly breaking the Israeli's serve.

"I know Shahar well," Sharapova said after the match, which saw a large and noisy turnout of Israeli supporters. "She encouraged the crowd to cheer louder, but it ended up being in my favor because it seemed like she felt that she couldn't win this match on her own."

In the second match of the day, 81st seed Tzipi Obziler lost to seventh-ranked Anna Chakvetadze 6:4, 6:2, despite being 3:0 up in the first set.

The Russian team advanced to the semi-finals. After the first day of Fed Cup Singles, Israel and Russia ended on equal standings. Peer defeated Dinara Safina and Sharapova breezed past Obziler.

Is there a Jewish marriage crisis?

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Jewish history is in many ways the story of marriage. The various unions, too many to count in the Bible alone, define the generations and ancestries that lead from the first Jewish family through enslavement in Egypt, glory in Israel, expulsion and anti-Semitism.

This is perhaps why the Bible takes such pain to provide the details of various family trees, even though the majority of names on these lists are inconsequential to the larger biblical story: the notion of a cohesive family unit, sustained by marriages and births, is in and of itself endemic to Judaism.

So I can understand why some Jews have been sounding the alarms of a marriage crisis in various Jewish communities. And I can even fathom why one Jewish marriage expert recently called the situation an "epidemic" during a speech in Toronto – though likening "un-marriage" to an infectious disease is probably going a bit overboard. For Jews, it is not incorrect to define a falling marriage rate as a serious religious problem.

This explains the explosion of efforts over the last five years to help young Jews find mates: websites, singles events and an ever-growing army of shadchans have been established to help Jews of marriageable age find suitable husbands and wives, so that they, too, can join the religious tradition of expanding the Jewish genealogy. Yet the crisis persists, and no one seems to understand why.

There is, I think a simple answer: marriage isn't what it used to be. For thousands of years, marriage was closely related to family ties, economics and social class. And the decision of who should marry whom was made by parents and relatives, not the two immediate parties. Love was sometimes a byproduct of these unions, but almost never the predominant reason for marriage.

But over the last hundred years or so, the situation has taken a dramatic turn. Young people developed the notion that they should be the ones to choose their spouses. And in many ways this revolution has made marriage a much happier, loving union: As marriage expert Stephanie Coontz writes in a recent essay titled The Future of Marriage, "A good marriage is fairer and more fulfilling for both men and women than couples of the past could ever have imagined."

That's the good news. The bad news is that the new marriage model has made the old standard so unattractive that singlehood has become the preferred state for those who don't, can't or haven't yet found the perfect match. Coontz again explains: "The forces that have strengthened marriage as a personal relationship between freely consenting adults have weakened marriage as a regulatory social institution."

The rapid change in how people get married is a worldwide phenomenon. But it's easy to see why tight-knit religious and ethnic groups, Jews among them, would feel the effects more acutely than the larger trend. In these sorts of groups, reconciling an old standard with the complex redefining of marriage is bound to cause confusion.

The mere fact that the downward trend in Jewish marriages is being called a "crisis" indicates that the notion of marriage as law, or at least social law, is still alive even while union as personal preference takes hold with younger generations. There is a fundamental gap, then, between those who want to get married but only under the right conditions and those who simply want people to get married. Both groups view marriage as a goal, but seemingly under different circumstances and with different motivations.

Which leaves the question: is there a Jewish marriage crisis? I would argue no – that an evolutionary shift in the concept of marriage has led young people to look for something more when considering when, or even if, to get married. Where the crisis may lie is if those institutions so bent on helping Jews to get married cannot evolve to help today's marriage candidates find the partners they're looking for.

New Views

Jewish students standing alone

Rabbi Steven Greenberg, a gay Orthodox rabbi, a graduate of Yeshiva University, an author and a senior teaching fellow at the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership (CLAL), was a keynote speaker.

Judy Cohen, an erudite Holocaust survivor, and Dr. Alchior Dor, a bold survivor of "Sudan," spoke on a panel titled "Remembering Auschwitz To Defend Darfur."

I put my speech into a tikun olam context. I said one of the ways we can strengthen ourselves is by fully appreciating an idea from Pirkei Avot: Who is a wise person? One who learns from everyone.

I said there are at least four groups of people we might look to to grow as a Jew.

Firstly, it is imperative we investigate the very grassroots social services and acts of chesed done by the Orthodox community. This community regularly responds to hordes of "collectors" who approach them on a daily basis in shul and/or at their homes for tzedakah for dozens of causes. There are volunteer and loan groups for everyone, including the bride without a gown. The strong and aggressive Orthodox Jewish response to the needy stems from years of thought and Torah learning.

I suggested to the 60 conference participants that they should study the successes of the Conservative and Reform community, as well as alternative groups, who have created sophisticated organizations and entities to respond to Jews and non-Jews in distress everywhere. Their activism, I believe, is one of the heart, an emotional appreciation and understanding of the despair and suffering of others in the world.

The third group I said we need to appreciate is the non-Jew. Throughout the world, you'll find veteran non-Jewish charities tending to the outcasts, the untouchables and the handicapped. Many NGOs driven by their faith and Christian goodness have managed to enlighten the world about the basic needs of a child living at the base of Mount Kilimanjaro or a village struggling to build wells in war-ravaged Congo.

Finally, I said, watch the extraordinary giving spirit of a baby and/or a toddler. I used my son, Noah River, as an example, a gentle beautiful spirit who naturally offers me his cucumber or veggie dog with a smile and a look that says, "We're both here. Isn't it obvious we should both eat?" Learn from children because their selflessness translates into a drive to create oneness. Perhaps they are closest to God.

In Guelph, I met brave Jewish students who frequently stand alone on campus defending the Jewish people and Israel. When I was there, I realized I needed to inform you of the gratitude we owe these front-line students, who defend us against anti-Semitism and some of the underside of humankind found in campus lecture halls and the central squares of our great places of learning. I also wanted to let you know they need a lot more funding to fight on our behalf! Let's thank them through more generous funding.

BRUNSWICK STEW

Ingredients

- 6 skinless, boneless chicken pieces
- 1/2 c each onions, celery, peppers, chopped
- Cayenne pepper or hot sauce (optional)
- 1/2 c oil
- chicken broth (enough to cover)
- 3 c lima beans
- 2 tsp Worcestershire sauce
- 1 can tomatoes
- 5 bay leaves
- 5 cloves
- 3 c kernel corn

Directions

Dredge chicken pieces in seasoned flour. Sauté slowly in hot oil until light brown. Remove from pan. Brown onions, celery & peppers in same fat. Place chicken, veggies, tomatoes, broth, cloves & bay leaves in large pot. Cover and simmer until chicken is nearly tender (about 2 hrs). Add lima beans and corn and continue simmering until veggies are tender (about 45 mins longer). Season with Worcestershire sauce, hot sauce,

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

VAST THRONG PROTESTS NAZIS: In November 1938, shortly after the German Night of Broken Glass, or Kristallnacht, more than 16,000 outraged citizens of all faiths filled Maple Leaf Gardens in protest. Thousands of others were turned away and gathered in other venues. As reported in the Toronto Star, Mayor Ralph C. Day proclaimed that "Canadians were all Hebrews" in solidarity with the Jews against the Nazis. Numerous rabbis and church leaders offered prayers, and messages were read from Albert Einstein and others. A. B. Bennett, head of Canadian Jewish Congress, predicted the Jews would survive to witness the end of Nazism, and Christian pastor E. Crosley Hunter said that Hitler "will pass, as did Nebuchadnezzar." Sixty anti-Nazi rallies were held that week across Canada.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I was asked to speak at a Canadian Federation of Jewish Student (CFJS) and Guelph Jewish Organizations Challenge Weekend held in Guelph, Ont., last month.

It is a pleasure to speak at student conferences as it gives me the opportunity to meet and learn from inspiring young Jewish leadership who understand the Jewish community and tikun olam. I have spoken at similar conferences in Montreal, Kingston and Vancouver.

This conference was co-ordinated by superlative Jewish professionals such as Elyse Kayfetz, Ya'acov Fruchter, Haley Gottfried and CFJS volunteer president, Alex Halpern. Ontario university students, from Guelph, Waterloo, St. Catharines, Toronto, and London attended.

The theme of the conference was My Jewish Challenge. I was asked to speak on "How We Can Challenge Ourselves To Be Better Jews."

Because...

...we were so filled with gratitude for the care Mount Sinai gave our very premature daughter.

— Amanda Demers & Brian Collins

Brian and Amanda's first child, Charlotte, was born prematurely, weighing only one pound, eight ounces. "Mount Sinai looked after my wife and child during the pregnancy; delivered Charlotte with great skill; and then cared for her in the Valentine Neonatal Intensive Care Unit for the first three and a half months of her life," Brian Collins says. "Her birth was an opportunity for us to reflect on the communities that have shaped who we are and reflect our values. Mount Sinai is definitely up there."

...ordinary people can sometimes do the most extraordinary things.

— John Honsberger

According to John Honsberger, attorney and executor for Doris Mack, she was a humble person who grew up in the Depression and was "never sure whether she would have enough. Mrs. Mack did know, however, that she wanted whatever she and her husband had left, to help young medical students. I don't think she had any idea of how important her contribution to Mount Sinai would be."

These are just a few of the people who have created a meaningful legacy that includes Mount Sinai Hospital. To learn more about including Mount Sinai in your legacy, or to share your story with us, please call or visit.

Sharing the pain helps in the healing process

When she speaks to groups about her cancer diagnosis, Isa Nevsky often jokes that she got a "bum rap." Over the past 15 years of her "journey" through colon, liver and lung cancer, she learned how to deal with her disease, and to face it with dignity, humour, and a healing spiritualism.

Now, as a cancer coach, she is helping others through their cancer journeys — sharing her experiences and her knowledge.

"When we need emotional healing, we know a psychiatrist or social worker can help. A cancer coach is just as important. No one should go through the healing process alone," she says.

Nevsky's services range from mundane tasks such as organizing a test-result filing system and steering clients toward medical resources to note-taking at medical appointments, accompanying clients to treatments and guiding them and their family and friends in the cancer journey.

"One of my clients had no family nearby. She was scared... felt alone and lost. I kept her company during her chemotherapy, and we worked together to keep her focused on the positives in her life. My goal is to help cancer patients regain their strength and motivation and to help cut through the chaos and paralysis of the unknown," Nevsky says.

She strongly encourages clients to be active with their doctors in planning their treatment. She does not provide medical advice or treatment.

Nevsky's own story is an incredible one, complete with years of misdiagnoses, culminating in a quick surgery to determine the extent of her cancer. Unfortunately, her colon cancer had metastasized into her liver and had become a stage-four tumour the size of a pear. She was told she had between six weeks and six months to live.

With radiation and chemotherapy, Nevsky experienced every known side effect — nausea, hair loss, fatigue and the eradication of her white blood cells, which landed her in a coma after just one week of chemo. "It was an awful time, and I became extremely depressed, which is common for cancer patients," she says.

"But, I kept seeing the three amazing faces of my children and knew they were the reason I had to keep living."

It was then she read about the Healing Journey program at Princess Margaret Hospital and acknowledged that she had to help herself to heal her mind, body and spirit. "The program makes us look at ourselves closely. When we have 'dis-ease,' we realize there is too much stress for our bodies to handle. We must re-evaluate how we treat ourselves, and most importantly, we must learn to listen to our bodies. This is paramount to healing."

The Healing Journey also made Nevsky realize that we need others to acknowledge our illness and be able to share it with us. "Women especially, as wives and mothers, tend to hide their feelings from their families. They don't want those they love to see their pain," she says.

A cancer coach can take some of this burden off a family's shoulders. The coach will work with families and advocate for patients with their doctors. "People are often afraid to speak up and ask questions. We just take what our doctors say and don't follow our own gut," Nevsky says. "A coach can help people figure out their feelings and needs, and work with them before, during and after the cancer treatments, to make sure they're getting the best care they can."

She learned even more about the healing process after a diagnosis of lung cancer, four years after her first bout with the disease. Utilizing Wellspring — a program that offers alternative therapies such as reiki (therapeutic touch), yoga, tai chi and art therapy — Nevsky focused on mind/body/spiritual healing.

"I believe that HaShem has a purpose for me. I survived in order to give back and help other people on the same journey I had experienced," she says.

She began volunteering at Sunnybrook Hospital and Wellspring, serving as a peer counsellor, worked at hospices and in palliative care, and completed training courses with Circle of Care, the Healing Journey and with George Brown College, in a life skills coaching program. Through her continuing volunteer efforts, she works with individuals and families to help them cope and deal with cancer.

Nevsky recently turned this passion for helping people into her business, IsaAngel, and offers lectures to groups, plus a wide variety of services to individuals and families.

Kids and chiropractic: proceed with caution

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Fed up after years of aches and pains, Renée Czukar did what four million Canadians do each year — she turned to a chiropractor. And when she noticed after a few months that the treatment was having a positive effect, not just on her joint pain and backaches, but on her asthma and life-long eczema, she immediately thought of her daughter, Olivia, then four years old, who also suffered from eczema.

"She's had it really bad: behind her knees, behind her ears... in the winter, around her fingers," Czukar says.

Three months after Olivia began seeing chiropractor Dr. Ron Nusbaum, her eczema was gone. After a year and a half, Czukar says, and through two winters, "it still hasn't come back at all."

That's not surprising, Nusbaum says. Chiropractic — although often used as an adjective, it's actually a Greek noun, meaning "treatment by hand" — works in resonance with the body's natural function, removing neurological barriers to healing caused by subtle injuries or lifestyle factors. Chiropractic "makes people better from the inside out."

"There are so many conditions people don't think to go to a chiropractor for," beyond neck and back pain, says Nusbaum, who left dental school more than 20 years ago to become a chiropractor, and established the Carrville Family Chiropractic in Richmond Hill, Ont., 10 years ago.

Kid-friendly posters greet even the youngest patients, who see him for everything from eczema to bedwetting and recurrent ear infections.

Chiropractors believe most medical conditions — even those that seem completely unrelated, such as diabetes — have a neuromusculoskeletal component, a nerve blockage sometimes called a subluxation that prevents healing. Through realigning the neck and spine, they say nerve function is improved, leading to better health overall.

"The whole concept makes sense to me," Czukar says.

"All the nerve endings come out of [the neck and spine] — everything attaches."

In children as in adults, subluxations are caused by chemical, emotional or physical trauma. Many chiropractors even believe that the birth process can potentially irritate the spine, and hold that this underlying trauma is one potential explanation for colic and other conditions of infancy.

But that assertion is "highly, highly non-scientific," cautions Montreal pediatrician Dr. Denis Leduc. Parents should be wary of any "practitioner who says that the birth experience misaligns the spine," requiring "preventative therapy for the next year or so and regular visits for readjustments."

As past president of the Canadian Paediatric Society (CPS), Leduc stands behind CPS' official statement that few chiropractic methods have been scientifically validated, and expressing concern that chiropractors may overstep the bounds of their training and expertise.

The CPS statement suggests "rational" use of chiropractic to treat specific musculoskeletal conditions. Of serious concern, Leduc says, is that some chiropractors give parents information that may dissuade them from immunizing their kids. In one very small study, one-third of surveyed American chiropractors believed immunizations "cause more disease than they prevent."

While the Canadian Chiropractic Association (CCA) officially accepts vaccination "as a cost-effective and clinically efficient public health preventative procedure" and reiterates that immunization is not a "chiropractic specific issue," Leduc worries that individual chiropractors' attitudes, combined with U.S. anti-vaccination literature, could mislead parents.

"Any chiropractor who... suggests to parents that vaccines are not useful, I would certainly be very, very cautious about that chiropractor's expertise in anything else he or she does."

Another factor parents must watch out for, he says, is "making sure the chiropractor doesn't do any forceful manipulation of baby's spine."

But Nusbaum says that contrary to popular belief, chiropractic adjustment is neither violent nor painful, especially where children are involved.

When Czukar first brought Olivia to see "Dr. Ron," he just chatted with her for a couple of visits until they'd established a rapport.

It's essential for new parents to get adequate sleep

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The miracle of birth has been well described over the years. Parents the world over know the blissful joy that comes with bringing a new life into the world and creating a new family.

Slightly less talked about is the dark side to becoming a parent – sleep deprivation.

Whether it's colic, rounds of breastfeeding or just raw nerves, new moms and pops can expect some fitful sleep in the first few months after birth.

For new moms particularly, the lack of sleep can present some medical issues that shouldn't be ignored.

Dr. Bev Young, a psychiatrist and head of Toronto's Mount Sinai Perinatal Mental Health Program for the last three years, stresses the importance for new moms to find ways to sleep through the night in order to help stave off post-partum depression.

"I'm very strict about [sleep]. Because I think that if it doesn't necessarily cause it, it may exacerbate post-partum," she told The C.N. "Every woman I [treat] says their problems started when they couldn't get to sleep."

Young and her team at Mt. Sinai have treated thousands of new mothers and always prescribe sleep as an initial treatment for post-partum and other stress disorders in new parents.

"Anxiety is more common than depression," Young said. "And what's the first thing anxiety effects? Your sleep. Because you're ruminating and can't shut your mind off."

What happens next is something many new parents can relate to: excessive irritability.

Earlier this year, Doug Salomon, and his wife, Linda Martel, welcomed their second son into the world. While this second child is taking it easy on them in the sleep department, they remember the days of sleep deprivation from their first baby.

"We were told we should sleep when the baby sleeps," Salomon recalled. "The problem was, he slept for 10 minutes at a time. At one point, I was so tired I was almost crying. It wasn't so much that I was irritable, I felt more depressed. We just wanted sleep."

Eytan Hadad of Bradford, Ont., remembers his family's early days and advises parents that sleep should never take a back seat lest crankiness occur.

Dr. Bev Young

"Take turns, and try to nap during the day when the baby is napping. Housework can get done together later in the day," he said.

Young concurs wholeheartedly.

"I educate women and their partners about shift work. What's the point in both of you being up? There is none," she states.

"You have to do a tag-team approach. If there's a way of implementing a bottle, even if it means pumping, get the baby used to the bottle so the woman can go to bed earlier. Once the mother is on somewhat of a schedule, she can go to bed [and] then the partner can [take over for] the next feed."

Young advises against parents trying to stay awake by ingesting excessive amounts of caffeine.

"I'm against using stimulants like coffee as a Band-Aid," she said. "Why are you trying to stimulate yourself? It can have an effect on sleep, no matter how early [in the day] you take them. A lot of these women tell me they're drinking coffee or cola, and it's just going to make their anxiety worse, make them more agitated and irritable."

And if all else fails, call in the cavalry.

"I say, if you can afford it, get a night nurse or a nanny... someone to watch that baby at night," Young says. "Get in your mother or mother-in-law, get your husband to take time off work. This is a mental health issue, a medical issue."

Sleep deprivation can lead to reduced mental alertness, memory impairment, decreased decision-making and problem-solving abilities, heart disease and hypertension, among other reactions.

The Ontario Ministry of Health and Long Term Care website cites the following as top causes of sleep deprivation among adults in the province: stress, drugs, nicotine, caffeine, conflict, pain and depression.

Crying newborns are not listed.

"Before retiring for the evening, a brisk walk, a hot bath or even meditation can help you relax and take your mind off these stressors," the ministry advises on its website. "Sticking to a regular sleeping schedule (waking up and going to bed at the same time everyday, even on weekends), exercising regularly (morning preferably), sleeping on a comfortable bed and avoiding heavy meals before turning in for the night can also greatly enhance your sleep quality."

Families learn to deal with dementia

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The C/JN

Family caregivers often find the responsibility of caring for their loved ones who have dementia or Alzheimer's disease overwhelming.

The family members are faced with loss, pain and often a feeling of helplessness.

The emotional trauma of watching a loved one who is fading away from the people and the world he or she once knew, becomes a grieving period while family members grasp for any method of prolonging memory.

The diagnosis of the disease was made 100 years ago by Dr. Alois Alzheimer. It's a progressive dementia that robs sufferers of their memory, judgment, cognition, motor skills and the ability to function independently.

Steven Shulman and his cousin are responsible for their 94-year-old aunt who has no children. He has watched his Aunt May (not her real name) gradually having to cope with vascular dementia.

"She now has forgetful periods where this independent woman is not able to live at home and is in a retirement residence with additional help," says Shulman who is the Ontario regional director and national general counsel at Canadian Jewish Congress.

Sharon Galway, owner of Home Instead Senior Care in Toronto

He explains that his aunt was always very active and worked in the family business. Her husband died 10 years ago and she continued to live independently in her own apartment.

"Unfortunately, things changed the level of her independence five years ago when she was hit by a car while crossing the road. And over the past few years, there have been varying degrees of forgetfulness, such as forgetting what happened earlier in the day," Shulman explains.

But there are new things being tried that help people like Aunt May.

Shulman says, for example, that along with the care his aunt receives at the retirement residence, "we decided that our aunt required additional activities and mental stimulation, so we turned to Home Instead Senior Care to provide that extra assistance and companionship for her."

According to Sharon Galway, owner of Home Instead Senior Care in North York, when it comes to the aging mind, more and more research is giving new meaning to the popular phrase, "use it or lose it."

"An increasing body of evidence indicates that keeping the mind active can help prevent or slow down the onset of disease common to the elderly, such as Alzheimer's or dementia," says Galway.

Galway, who is a registered nurse, says that years ago, when her in-laws became ill, the family hired caregivers, but then had problems with theft. With her background as a nurse in mental health, abuse of women, and palliative care, she set up the Prevention of Elder Abuse Committee in York Region and became its chair.

In 2004, she made caring for elderly people her new career when she bought Canada's first franchise of Home Instead Senior Care, the world's largest home care service provider.

"I saw that seniors were not getting the care they needed," she says. Home Instead Senior Care, whose goal is to keep the mind active, provides non-medical care services for seniors. There are 21 independently owned locations in six provinces in Canada and 700 franchises throughout the world.

Galway says that to keep mentally fit, today's seniors are saying goodbye to traditional games like bingo and gravitating to video-game technology and such activities as Scrabble and bridge tournaments.

According to the Alzheimer's Society of Canada, 300,000 Canadians over the age of 65 have Alzheimer's disease and research indicates that the figures are expected to grow. Two-thirds of the victims of Alzheimer's are women.

At this time, there is no cure for Alzheimer's disease but there are medications that alleviate the symptoms and improve the quality of life for some patients for a period of time.

Seniors caring for seniors

Being a senior is supposed to be a golden time, right?

Well, in our society, that is the common dream for the future. The idea is that after working hard for 40-plus years, retirement should be a glorious period to do the things you've always wanted to do — take it easy, enjoy the finer things in life and so on.

But there's a phenomenon that's throwing a wrench in the lives of people 65 and older: seniors taking care of seniors.

Modern medicine has increased life expectancy significantly, and as a result, it isn't unusual for a 70-year-old to have parents or a spouse who are in need of hands-on care.

And as more and more baby boomers age, millions of Canadians will find themselves in a role they didn't expect.

"I always thought my wife and I would do all kinds of travelling once we retired," says Dr. Bob Lester, a 71-year-old recent retiree. "That's all gone now."

Lester, who retired as chief medical executive at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre after 41 years with the hospital, is coping with the demands of caring for his wife Judy, who has dementia.

She needs constant care with everything from getting in and out of bed to eating meals.

Like many seniors in a similar situation, Lester feels his own age limits his ability to care for his wife, so he has hired a professional caregiver.

"I am in fairly decent shape, but I don't have the mobility and strength that I had when I was younger," Lester says.

"Moving her around or lifting her out of bed is a little more difficult now."

As well, the expense of paying for a professional caregiver was not part of the retirement plans he made years ago.

"It's a financial worry that I had not planned upon," Lester says. "It has made a total difference."

There are also the emotional challenges that come with looking after an elderly parent or spouse with many needs.

Frustration, anger, anxiety and a sense of being overwhelmed are all emotions that can affect a senior who cares for another senior.

But the news is not all bad.

Because seniors have common health ailments, they will likely be better able to empathize with their ill parents or spouse.

In Lester's case, he is currently spending part of the winter with his wife in Arizona, and he feels that on a mental level, his age and life experience are somewhat beneficial.

"I tend to be a positive person, and I think that with my life experience, this is something I am able to cope with fairly well," Lester says.

"As you get older, you tend to be a little more accepting of things. And not working full time also makes this a little easier."

After retiring, seniors have much more free time, which provides many opportunities to be with their grandchildren, socialize with friends, or exploring and discovering whatever they want to.

"I have never been in this situation before where I have three months to play golf, swim, exercise and see my grandchildren regularly," Lester says.

"I can now think a lot about this next phase of my life."

Lack of companionship cited

The Alzheimer's Society notes, however, that there are things people can do to reduce the risk.

The organization recently began a two-year awareness program called "Heads up for healthier brains," which claims that varying one's routine and doing word puzzles, jigsaws and memory games can help keep the disease at bay.

A study at the University of New South Wales in Sydney, Australia, published last year in Psychology Medicine, found that even a late-in-life surge in mental activity can stave off effects of the disease.

The current best seller, The Brain That Changes Itself (Viking 2007) by Canadian psychiatrist Dr. Norman Doidge, explains the revolution in neuroscience that says the brain is malleable and can overcome serious brain injuries and illness.

It details case histories of people whose plight was considered hopeless. It's all about having the brain change its structure and function, even in advanced age.

Galway told The C/JN that one of the problems for many seniors who want to stay mentally active is lack of companionship, especially for older adults who live alone.

"Through games and puzzles, cards and music, Home Instead caregivers have seen lives change for many older adults throughout the community. Sometimes, seniors just need a little encouragement from family and friends to help them pursue interests that can keep their minds stimulated."

Home Instead Senior Care includes companionship, meal preparation, medication reminders, light housekeeping and escorts for errands, shopping and medical appointments, Galway says.

"We offer an Alzheimer's training program which is the first of its kind for non-medical caregivers," she says.

Among their list of "Mind-Stimulating Fun Tips," Home Instead includes interactive video games, computer games such as solitaire or joining an online bridge game, music, playing an instrument, game tournaments, jigsaw puzzles, attending concerts and lectures, maintaining an interest in politics and companionship.
